

THE VIRGINIA
RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE.

No. 6.) For November & December 1807. (VOL. 3,

THE FAITHFUL PREACHER.

A SERMON.

Delivered before the Presbytery of Hanover, at Bethesda,
October 23, 1807.

BY THE REV. CONRAD SPEECE. A. B.

Published by request of the Presbytery.

.....

DEDICATION.

TO EDWARD GRAHAM ESQUIRE.

DEAR SIR,

PERMIT me to prefix your name to this sermon, and to request your acceptance of it as a token of my esteem and affection. To you it is owing, under God, that my humble talents had an opportunity of being cultivated by liberal education. Your kind patronage, at a time when it was necessary to the commencement of my academical studies, and afterwards when it was equally necessary to their completion, has made impressions on my heart which time will never efface. While this page lives, it shall preserve the expression of my gratitude. With fervent wishes for your happiness, temporal and eternal, I am,

Dear Sir,

Your greatly obliged

And obedient servant,

C. SPEECE.

And Micaiah said, As the Lord liveth, even what my God saith, that will I speak.

THE history of Micaiah's prophecy, recorded in this chapter, contains many things worthy of serious attention. Of these the prophet's firm adherence to duty, in the midst of strong temptations to the contrary, is the most affecting and instructive.

Ahab, the wicked king of Israel, had projected an expedition for the conquest of Ramoth-Gilead; and had prevailed with his neighbour Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, to assist and accompany him in the war. Jehoshaphat, with his usual piety, wished to know before they set out whether the enterprise was favoured by divine approbation; and for this purpose desired Ahab to "inquire at the word of the Lord."—Accordingly Ahab "gathered together of prophets four hundred men," probably Baal's prophets, who with one voice repeatedly encouraged their master to "go up against Ramoth-Gilead," assuring him that "the Lord would deliver it into his hand." It seems that Jehoshaphat entertained some suspicion of these prophets, notwithstanding their number, unanimity, and apparent confidence. Though he had wanted prudence to avoid an alliance with Ahab, the fruit of a dangerous affinity between their families, and which in the event nearly proved fatal to this amiable but too flexible prince; yet he was now solicitous to be informed truly of the mind of the Lord on the subject, and therefore resolved to pursue the inquiry farther. "Is there not here," said he, "a prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him?" Ahab replied that there was; but added, "I hate him, for he never prophesieth good unto me, but always evil: the same is Micaiah the son of Imla." Such is the gratitude of haughty sinners, especially those in high station, to their honest monitors! However, at the request of the king of Judah, Micaiah was sent for. The messenger, unless we suppose him grossly ignorant of the nature of prophecy, must have been an unprincipled courtier; for without ceremony he desired Micaiah to unite with the other prophets and gratify the king. "Behold, the words of the prophets declare good to the king with one assent: let thy word, therefore, I pray thee, be like one of theirs, and speak thou good."—Here was a tempting opportunity presented to Micaiah to regain the lost favour of his sovereign by flattering his views. On the other hand, he could not but foresee that if in this instance he "prophesied evil," as Ahab phrased it, he should bring upon himself the united resentments of four hundred false prophets, high in standing at court, and of an impious, arbitrary despot, whom he had already exasperated by frequent reproofs to the utmost limit of forbearance. By pursuing the history a little, we find that his upright conduct was in fact followed by the most afflictive consequences. He was insulted on all sides by contumelious language, smitten on the face by the leader of the lying prophets, and thrown by the king into an imprisonment peculiarly severe and ignominious. Yet under all the trying circumstances of the case, in the probable apprehension of reproach, imprisonment and death, he did not even hesitate, but instantly and immovably resolved to do his duty. "As the Lord liveth, even what my God saith, that will I speak."

Behold, my reverend brethren, an illustrious example of faithfulness in delivering the messages of God to his creatures! An example manifestly recorded for our imitation. To illustrate this duty, and excite you to the practice of it, are the objects of the present discourse.

Faithfulness signifies a stedfast adherence to duty in opposition to the assaults of temptation. By faithfulness in preaching I understand a habitual, efficacious determination to declare to mankind all things which God hath given us in charge, however we may be tempted to conceal or disguise them; and especially, however disagreeable they may be to our hearers, and whatever painful consequences the declaration of them may bring upon ourselves. An awful task indeed; but indispensably imposed upon every preacher of the word, and which most solemnly regards at once the glory of God, the eternal welfare of our fellow creatures, and the salvation of our own souls.

The duty under consideration resolves itself into two great branches; namely, faithfulness in preparing for the pulpit, and faithfulness in the actual performance of its exercises.

I. He who conceives justly of the preaching of God's word will not dare to undertake it in a hasty, inconsiderate manner. He will contemplate the work with trembling diffidence, and inquire anxiously by what means he may be in some tolerable measure qualified for it.

Besides a competent portion of natural talents, preparation for the pulpit implies a heart fervently devoted to the glory of God and the salvation of mankind; together with a rich furniture of knowledge in the things which are to be preached. The Apostle appears to include both these in his excellent injunction to Timothy: "Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."*

Without the faithful spirit of preaching men may and, alas, often do intrude themselves into the sacred office. But their labours are a contemptible body without a soul. They themselves are an abomination in the sight of God, and a curse rather than a blessing to their hearers. Now this spirit of zeal and firmness in the ministry is so far from being an effect of chance, or a production of our depraved nature; that it is one of the most noble and precious fruits of divine grace in the heart. It is therefore to be sought by continual and earnest prayer. If we are required to call upon God with humble supplication even for the commonest blessings, we ought more especially to implore of him this heavenly elevation above the allurements and the terrors of the world in discharging the arduous duties of our ministry. And while we pray for this most necessary endowment, let us also labour to cultivate it in ourselves by constant practice, as well as by reflection on those weighty motives which urge us to fidelity, and of which some account will be attempted in a future part of this discourse.

But to a faithful spirit must be added a rich furniture of knowledge in divine things. For how can any man teach others what he knows not himself? Now there are but two conceivable ways by which this knowledge can be acquired: The one is immediate revelation from heaven, otherwise called the inspiration of suggestion, which supercedes all the ordinary processes of the mind in the discovery of truth. The other is dilligent study, under the common superintendence of God the Father of lights and Giver of wisdom.— As to immediate revelation, we dare not pretend to it, were we so disposed, without those attestations of miraculous power by which the extraordinary missions of the Apostles and their inspired predecessors were established, and which we know ourselves not to possess: To set up such a claim without miraculous proof would be to insult the common sense of mankind. We do indeed feel that we need, and we hope to obtain a certain gracious influence from God, which while it sanctifies the heart tends also to invigorate and direct the understanding in the pursuit of religious knowledge; an influence which may without impropriety be termed an inspiration from heaven. We believe that those who fear and serve God have much better prospects of attaining wisdom in things of this nature than men of a contrary character. For "the meek will God guide in judgment, and the meek will he teach his way."* But we claim no such inspiration as supercedes the exertion of our own mental powers; no such teaching of the Spirit as renders study and literature useless in the sacred office. If there are any who advance such high claims, we will not, we cannot believe them without the proof already mentioned. If study without prayer has been justly denominated atheism, it is equally true that prayer without study is presumption. It remains, therefore, that we faithfully devote ourselves to study as a necessary preparative for the pulpit. The exhortation of the Apostle to Timothy is full and express to this purpose. "Give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. Meditate on these things, give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear to all. Take heed unto thyself and unto thy doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee."†

* 2 Tim. ii. 15.

The great subject of all our ministerial studies is the holy scriptures. "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."‡ It is the word of God that we are emphatically commanded to preach;§ because this alone is able to make us and our hearers wise unto salvation.

May I presume to offer a few remarks on what appears to me the best method of studying the holy scriptures? Instead of allegorizing and torturing them into any meaning which fancy may suggest; instead of indolent recumbency on the judgment of a favourite commentator or paraphrast; instead of toiling through many vast volumes of what is called systematick divinity, tinctured as they generally are with a subtle philosophy quite foreign from the simplicity of divine revelation; permit me earnestly to urge the direct, critical study of the scriptures in their original languages.—It would be deplorable indeed if no man could be saved without reading his bible in Greek or Hebrew. Happily this is not the case. But is it not obviously the duty of those who are appointed specially to study and teach religion that they advance, if possible, to the fountain of divine instruc-

* Ps. xxv. 9.

† 1 Tim. iv. 13, 14, 15, 16.

‡ 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.

§ 2 Tim. iv. 2.

tion, and draw thence living water in its utmost purity? Our translation of the bible, valuable as it truly is, was made by uninspired and fallible men like ourselves; and it is impossible that any such translation should be equal to the original. We have the same right that our predecessors had, together with advantages in some respects superior to theirs, accumulated by the labours of genius and learning, to examine the authentick records of our religion for ourselves.—The study of the original scriptures, then, should be our chief and daily employment. And those auxiliary branches of knowledge which bear most directly upon this great object, should engage much of our esteem and attention. In this view let me recommend the reading and comparing of the best versions of scripture, antient and modern; the accurate investigation of the laws, customs, rites and ceremonies of the Jews, and of other nations mentioned in sacred history; an extensive acquaintance with the history of the Christian Church, and the writings of its earliest fathers. To these should be added the helps to be obtained from the works of learned biblical criticks and commentators of every age and of different persuasions. I say of different persuasions; for it is a narrow and hurtful prejudice to suppose that all useful learning is confined to writers of our own denomination. Such various aids are highly profitable to the student who has talents, opportunity and prudence to use them properly; who respectfully seeks their assistance without submitting tamely and blindly to their authority. For let it ever be remembered that in these things we have but one master, even God; and to him we are to give an account of our sentiments as well as of our actions.

As to systematick divinity, there is nothing surprising in its long and extensive prevalence in the Christian world: for if we love knowledge at all, we are naturally fond of seeing it in the shape of a system. But I humbly apprehend that this spirit has generally been carried to extremes in the church, and has hindered instead of advancing the progress of scriptural knowledge. Divine truths do certainly constitute a system the most harmonious and perfect. To its all-wise Author it can exhibit nothing obscure or doubtful. But to minds weak and limited as ours, especially in this infant state of our existence, many things are and must remain unsearchable. It is not permitted to us to satisfy always our restless curiosity, and to trace clearly those mysterious connexions which unite the truths of revelation with each other. We may eagerly attach ourselves to some favourite scheme, some plausible philosophical theory of religion which professes to remove all difficulties; and then collect disjointed portions of scripture to defend it against the assaults of other theories. We may toil away our days and our strength in attempting to solve, with the aid of the abstrusest dialectick, a thousand curious questions of no importance, and which never can be solved. Such are the common consequences of an excessive attachment to system.— But would it not be far better to apply ourselves directly and vigorously to the volume of inspiration, and thence learn with humility of heart what God has revealed? Would it not be going far enough in the way of system to take care that we do not adopt nor teach doctrines plainly inconsistent with the sacred standard and with each other? In a word is it not the part of wisdom to discern where our curious inquiries ought to stop; and to acknowledge without discontent our ignorance of things which need not and cannot be known? A concise, comprehensive treatise, aranged with some degree of systematick order, may be proper enough to suggest subjects for meditation, and to direct the student to useful reading. But to substitute human systems for the immediate study of God's word is something worse than a very circuitous path to the attainment of religious knowledge. The method of study which has been stated is indeed not less extensive or laborious. But it is more pleasing to the real lover of truth; better calculated to make us well acquainted with the sacred oracles, which are to be the subject of our preaching, and I think also, more likely to unite in sentiment all who sincerely reverence the book of God.

If any man should argue that since our version of the bible is confessedly just in the main, free from defect in fundamentals, there is no need of such a critical and laborious study of the original; he would betray very unworthy notions of the inspired volume, and would contradict its own express declarations. The scripture is not only profitable in fundamental articles: "all scripture is profitable."* Every particle of it is of some importance to be understood. The minutest portions of its history, its doctrine and its precepts are useful either in themselves or as they serve to shed light and beauty upon other passages.

In due subordination to the study of the scriptures, every competent judge will readily acknowledge the importance of science and elegant literature to the preacher as improving his preparation for the pulpit. Science strengthens our rational powers; gives us the valuable knowledge of our animal, intellectual and moral nature; and by making us acquainted with the works of God elevates our conceptions of his wisdom, power, goodness and universal government.— The various stores of polite literature furnish the sacred orator with a rich fund of materials for the pleasing expression and impressive illustration of divine truth. On this copious subject my limits do not permit me to enlarge.— But I cannot forbear to observe that while religion disdains the artifices of meretricious ornament, and appears to the best advantage in its own glorious simplicity, no good reason has ever been assigned for degrading it, to the disgust of all correct taste, by incoherence of thought or vulgarity of expression.

* 2 Tim. iii. 16.

It becomes us however, to guard against that pride which considerable attainments even in sacred knowledge, as well as in other branches of learning, are apt to excite in the deceitful heart of man. For this purpose, besides direct and habitual prayer for the grace of humility, we should often descend from the paths of critical study to the reading of the best devotional and practical treatises. By these means we shall imbibe and preserve the spirit of christian simplicity; we shall learn for ourselves how to reduce divine truth to practice; and perceive how absolutely we depend upon the grace of God to save us from sin and to strengthen us for his service. This kind of reading is also a very necessary part of a due preparation for preaching. All revealed truths are intended for practical utility: and we shall demonstrate those truths to little purpose unless we know how to inculcate them with this view, and lead our hearers to adopt them as effectual principles of piety and virtue.

In connexion with this suffer me to recommend frequent and familiar conversation with the people individually on experimental religion. Besides other reasons for it, such conversation, even with the plainest persons, will afford us many an useful hint of instruction on the various operations of grace and of sin in the soul, which might never have occurred to us in reading or meditation. This is a most desirable species of knowledge to a faithful preacher. The work of the Holy Spirit unites great uniformity with great varieties. These varieties we must pursue with patient industry, that we may rightly divide the word of truth, giving to every hearer his proper portion of instruction, reproof, or encouragement, moulded in conformity to the particular circumstances of his case.

I have not undertaken to ascertain, because it cannot be precisely ascertained what quantity of literary or even of theological knowledge is universally essential to the ministry. It is evident that they who are vested with the office should be "apt," that is, well qualified "to teach; not novices."* Our church has laid it down as a general rule, and surely it is a very judicious one, that candidates for the ministry shall have gone through a course of liberal education, as well as made some competent progress in theological studies. But we are not permitted to stop here. Let it be remembered that in taking upon us this extensive charge of religious instruction we should devote ourselves to a life of study, so far as health and opportunity may be afforded. We should labour unremittingly to enlarge and improve our own minds, that we may bring out of our treasure things new and old for the edification of the people. If at any period we suffer ourselves to lose the relish and habit of study, if we make no fresh acquisitions of knowledge; if we neglect our preparations, whether general or particular for the service of the sanctuary; we may assure ourselves that our stock of materials will soon be exhausted, and our publick discourses, wanting variety to engage attention and accuracy to enforce conviction, will become flat and uninteresting to the generality of our hearers.

Allow me, brethren, to close this part of the subject by warning you against some dangerous temptations to unfaithfulness in preparing for the exercises of the pulpit.

The first I shall mention is the spirit of indolence. The excessive love of ease is seldom considered in the serious light that it ought to be, as a sinful propensity, fraught with extensive mischief and directly contrary to the tenour of our holy religion. It is a vice exceedingly prevalent; and we are as liable to its attacks as others. If the foregoing account of a due preparation for preaching be at all correct, it implies great and persevering exertion of our faculties, and consequently much resolution and vigilance against the encroachments of an indolent disposition. We do indeed disapprove the practice of reading sermons; and in my opinion for very substantial reasons. But this very thing may become a snare to us, so as to render our sermons hasty and undigested harangues, little calculated to afford instruction to the hearers. If in other cases we labour to do things well in proportion to their supposed importance, are not our utmost exertions due to the preaching of God's holy word in the most dignified and useful manner? Surely we of all men should take care "not to be slothful in business, but fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."*

* 1 Tim. iii. 2, 6,

A second object of caution is what I venture to name the spirit of profane literature. A taste for reading and study, acquired in early life, is much less apt to be wholly lost than to be perverted into wrong channels. It has been already observed that science and elegant literature may be useful to us, provided they are properly subordinated to our great purpose of understanding and preaching the word of God. But as many studies of a scientific or literary kind are less laborious, as well as more alluring to the imagination, than those of biblical criticism and theology; as success in them promises to our vanity a more extensive fame in the world; we are too liable to be drawn away after them with an excessive fondness, quite unsuitable to our sacred functions and ruinous to our progress in divine knowledge. A teacher of religion ought carefully to watch and check these dangerous tendencies of the mind. Holiness to the Lord should be inscribed even on all his studies. And it would be miserable folly to exchange this important characteristic of our profession for the greatest pleasures or the highest fame in human science or literature. Such pursuits may, in this point of view, justly be denominated profane and unlawful.

A third temptation to neglect our preparatory studies is the supposed fact, by many confidently asserted, that illiterate and unstudious preachers are the most successful in the propagation of religion. Now it is true that a very learned ministry may be destitute of the requisite zeal and faithfulness, and consequently destitute of any considerable utility. And such is the inscrutable sovereignty of God's gracious influences that we sometimes see even the most able and devoted ministers of Christ labour long in the vineyard without much visible fruit of their labours; while others of far inferior qualifications are made more successful in turning sinners from their evil ways. But after all, is not religion a reasonable service? Is not a just exhibition of its doctrines, precepts, promises and threatenings the great instrument appointed by divine constitution for the salvation of mankind? Shall we without serious examination admit a position pregnant with the strange conclusion that a learned must necessarily be an unfaithful ministry? Or that God should raise up men of talents and literary improvements, endow them with fervent zeal for his glory, and require them to consecrate all their time and abilities to the service of his sanctuary; and yet uniformly or generally prefer weak, illiterate and ignorant men in carrying on the great designs of his kingdom? Rather than adopt these extravagant ideas I may be compelled to suspect that among the advocates of an ignorant clergy many things are made to pass for conversion, faith, love, religious experience and bearing the cross of Christ which have, in reality, little or nothing of the spirit of true religion in them. It may be observed also that so far as illiterate teachers and their flocks do attain to religious knowledge and practice they are much indebted, however unwilling to own the obligation, to the preaching and writings of learned ministers. In fine, if there be still any difficulty in the case, it cannot be so strong as to warrant our renunciation or neglect of duties prescribed by the word of God and the soundest reason.

* Rom. xii. 11.

The last danger I shall mention, and perhaps, the greatest of all, is that of a wordly spirit; an undue thirst for the pleasures, the honours, and especially the riches of the present life. Let me not be misunderstood on this subject.—A minister of Christ, having the same common nature, feels the same common wants with other men. He can no more subsist than they without food, raiment and other needful accommodations. He has a right as well as they to become a husband, a father, the head of a family. And when he does, it is among his primary duties to provide for those of his own household. For this provision, indeed, he has a perfect claim upon the people, if they are able to support him; for “so hath the Lord ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel.”* But if, as sometimes happens, the people are unable, or, which is oftener the case, if they are unwilling to give their pastor the necessary support; he is not only permitted but required to betake himself for support to other resources. In such a situation he must withdraw a portion of his time from ministerial studies and labours, and do from absolute necessity what the Apostles did from prudential choice, work with his hands; or by some other employment not misbecoming a Christian provide things honest in the sight of all men for himself and those who depend upon him. But let ministers beware of the spirit of luxurious living; of too much costliness and splendour in their houses, furniture, tables, dress, or equipage. Let them endeavour to qualify their children for usefulness by good education; but beware of indulging them in expensive as well as in criminal pleasures; or of aiming to accumulate large fortunes for them by employing in secular avocations the time and attention which ought to be devoted to sacred duties. On such a subject minute and specifick rules are not to be expected. But surely we need to use great watchfulness in these things if we would be found faithful to our God, our fellow creatures and ourselves: We should pray without ceasing for the heavenly, self-denying mind which was in Christ Jesus our Lord.— The indulgence of a worldly spirit will soon impair our ministerial character in the publick estimation, and greatly injure the life and efficacy of our ministerial labours. While, therefore, many ignorantly or maliciously charge us with the inordinate love of money, let us take care that the heavy accusation may never be confirmed by our own consciences. If the people of God universally are required to walk as strangers and pilgrims in the world, to set their affection on things above, not on things on the earth, yea to be dead to the world that they may live unto God! a double portion of these holy tempers is manifestly necessary to us who have consecrated ourselves to the ministry of the gospel. Whenever we think justly of our awful functions we naturally exclaim; as even an Apostle did “who is sufficient for these things?”* None of us, assuredly, without the supports of almighty grace. How then shall we be able to finish our course with joy, or to appear with confidence before our God, if we forfeit his favour by an excessive attachment to the pursuits and gratifications of the present world? May God preserve us from a catastrophe so dreadful!

* 1 Cor. ix. 14.

II. Having considered what belongs to faithfulness in preparing for the pulpit, let us now proceed to contemplate the same faithfulness in the actual performance of its exercises. It implies, comprehensively speaking, a firm undisguised declaration of all things which God hath given us in charge, that is, of all things contained in his holy word.— We are to be animated with Micaiah’s spirit of integrity and zeal: “even what our God saith, that are we to speak.” But the subject requires to be unfolded in a more particular manner.

In the first place, then, the faithful preacher will boldly and explicitly proclaim the doctrines of divine truth, however contrary they may be to the prejudices or passions of his hearers, and whatever painful consequences may thence ensue to himself.

There is indeed a certain prudence in preaching the doc-

* 2 Cor. ii. 16.

times of revelation, in regard not only to the manner but to the matter also: a prudence undoubtedly lawful, and sometimes highly expedient. It is not our duty to be always dwelling on a few points, merely because they are peculiarly mysterious in themselves, or peculiarly disagreeable to the world; and then, as the manner of some is, to charge our brethren with culpable timidity, because they will not imitate us in this injudicious conduct. Not so did the Apostle Paul, one of the most faithful of preachers. "I have fed you," says he, "with milk, and not with meat: for hitherto ye were not able to bear it; neither yet now are ye able."* Yea, our Lord himself used the same prudence; in instructing his disciples: "I have yet many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now."† At the same time it becomes us to beware of mistaking or abusing this prudence. Let it be remembered as a fundamental principle that no truth whatever has been revealed from heaven devoid of all utility, or intended to be buried in perpetual silence. We are conscientiously to consider and judge when any truth is needful to be preached to the people; and when the moment arrives we are to go forward and preach it without fear of consequences.

This position shall be illustrated by a reference to several particular doctrines. And the task will be the more pleasing, as those doctrines which are the most unacceptable to a sinful world, and which therefore bring the preacher's faithfulness most strongly to the trial, are precisely the most important and essential truths of our holy religion.

My first instance shall be the doctrine of the Trinity.— This is purely a matter of revelation, and signifies that in the eternal Godhead there are three, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost, whom we call divine Persons, because personal properties and agencies are ascribed to them; and that these three are one God. Thus Christians are baptized "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."‡ And we are informed that "there are three who bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word," which is another name for the Son, "and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one."§ The opposers of this doctrine, whether avowed enemies or treacherous friends to the book of God, are men who boast much of their superiour reason and philosophy; who pretend, for it is indeed no more than a miserable pretence, to believe nothing which they cannot fully compre-

* 1 Cor. iii. 2.

† John xvi. 12.

‡ Matt. xxviii. 19.

§ 1 John v. 7.

hend. And many a bitter sarcasm do they fling upon the absurdity of asserting three Gods to be one God; an absurdity, however, of their own invention, for it is not the faith of Christians. We ought to acknowledge the doctrine of the triune God to be an inexplicable mystery; to beware of adopting any really inconsistent notions of it, or of advancing any thing farther in it than the holy scriptures clearly exhibit. For as to those writers who have attempted by philosophical illustration to bring it down to the level of human comprehension, they seem to me, however upright their intentions, to have done no service to the cause, nor much honor to their own understandings. But so far as God has been pleased to reveal it, we are to preach the doctrine with all firmness and perseverance. For it is so remote from being merely a point of obstruse speculation, that it is essentially interwoven with the great scheme of our salvation by Jesus Christ. We find in fact that those who reject this truth soon make shipwreck of the whole faith of the gospel.

Another doctrine which brings the faithfulness of the preacher severely to the test is that of the fall of man, commonly called the doctrine of original sin. The scriptures teach us that by the sin of the first man, our federal representative in the covenant of works, the whole human race have fallen from original rectitude into a state of depravity, guilt and condemnation. Here we are informed that "by one man's disobedience many were made sinners;* that "in Adam all die;"† that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned;"‡ that "all the world is become guilty before God;"§ and that "we are by nature children of wrath,"¶ under the curse of the Almighty. Indeed this doctrine is inscribed, either directly or indirectly, upon every page of the bible, and is abundantly confirmed by the history and experience of mankind. Whatever insolvable difficulties may attend it, the denial of it would overwhelm us with far more numerous and greater difficulties; would lead us rapidly to infidelity, and even to atheism itself.—Yet evident as the truth is, the man who preaches it faithfully must expect to be treated by many as a gloomy enthusiast, a patron of absurdity, a malignant calumniator of his species. Ridicule will sneer, pride will rage, and sophistry will fabricate a thousand subtle theories to refute the testi-

* Rom. v. 19.

† 1 Cor. xv. 22.

‡ Rom. v. 12.

§ Rom. iii. 19.

¶ Eph. ii. 3.

monies of God's word, or to explain them away. Some fondly dream that the soul of man at first is like a sheet of fair paper, susceptible alike of good or evil impressions; and talk much of education, not religious, but philosophical education, as the only thing necessary to make us wise, virtuous and happy. Some, by lowering the standard of moral duty almost to nothing, persuade themselves that there is, without any influence of divine grace, a vast quantity of virtue and goodness in the world; and that only a few very atrocious sinners can fail of meeting the approbation of their Maker. Others celebrate highly a certain seed of grace given to all men before they are born, and strongly inclining them to that which is good: which seed of grace, however, they tell us, with a wild confusion of ideas, God was bound in justice to bestow upon us, or else to have annihilated us in what they call our seminal state. And others, more hardy than all the rest, eagerly draw the conclusion that because mankind are hereditary sinners, therefore they are not sinners at all in a proper sense, nor punishable for their transgressions of moral order. An argument, by the way, which no man admits when pleaded by any but himself in regard to the duties which mankind own to each other. All these and other such idle reveries we are to condemn and refute, not by overbearing, dogmatical assertion, but by the authority of scripture and sound reason. We ought especially to guard our hearers against the fatal opinion that hereditary depravity excuses the sinner. This is done by properly explaining the nature of that depravity. It is our voluntary crime, under which we are no way necessitated to continue one moment longer than we freely choose to continue. No man ever was, nor in the nature of things can be compelled to the commission of any sin contrary to the present choice of his own heart. The fall has laid us, under no other kind of inability to love and serve God than the inability of the cruel man to be merciful, the debauchee to be chaste, or the miser to be generous. And who would allow such characters to plead this inability as an excuse for their vices? In a word, the reason why the sinner cannot perfectly comply with his whole duty is that he will not. At the same time, while we maintain the voluntary nature of this moral disease of the soul, we are not to lose sight of its deep inveteracy, and utter incurableness by human means. "In us, that is in our flesh dwelleth no good thing:"* there is in our depraved nature no particle of real holiness, no principle by which we may, either in whole or in part, obtain deliverance from sin and its tremendous consequences. The gospel continually proceeds upon the ground of our ruined and desperate condition; every where takes it for granted that we are lost in sin; without strength to extricate ourselves; and that "judgment hath come upon all men to condemnation."* Nor can we possibly be saved by faith in Jesus Christ without the humbling conviction that such are indeed our deplorable circumstances. In the midst, therefore, of scorn and opposition, of sarcasm and sophistry, we are to proclaim this fundamental doctrine frequently, with united compassion and faithfulness. We are to insist on it firmly that mankind are by nature universally guilty, condemned and helpless; and consequently that we can only be saved by the mercy of God, mercy which he has a sovereign right, without any impeachment of his justice or his goodness, to bestow upon one and withhold from another, as his infinite wisdom may judge proper.

* Rom. vii. 18.

The third instance which I shall use to illustrate the spirit of faithful preaching is the doctrine of justification through the righteousness of Christ. This is an essential pillar of that constitution of grace whence we derive our most beloved title of ministers of the gospel. But wherein consists the great faithfulness or self-denial of preaching this glorious doctrine? I answer, were we to content ourselves with representing Jesus Christ as a good man merely, who taught excellent morality, and left us a noble example of righteousness and of patience under sufferings; all would pass off smoothly and quietly enough. Or should we occasionally mention to our hearers in a vague and general way the merits of Christ, as necessary to supply the little deficiencies of their own obedience to the laws of God; still we should be heard patiently, and meet with little or no opposition on the subject even from the proudest sinners. They would, as indeed they often do, very familiarly call Jesus Christ their Lord and their Saviour. But we must go far, very far beyond all this in preaching the truth under consideration.—Jesus has indeed taught us excellent rules of duty, and left us a precious example of their practice: but this is only a subordinate part of what he has done for our salvation.—His sacred merits were intended for no such purpose as to be made a patch upon the defective robe of our own righteousness. No; instead of all such presumptuous curtailing and perversion of the gospel, we are to preach it in its unadulterated purity and undiminished fullness. We are to proclaim Jesus Christ as "God manifest in the flesh,"* the almighty and only Deliverer of wretched sinners. We are to assert the perfect vicarious satisfaction rendered by him to divine justice, including his spotless obedience and atoning death, summarily called in one word his righteousness, imputed to all who believe, as the only ground of our justification before God and title to eternal life. For the scriptures call the Son of God "the Lord our righteousness;"† "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth."‡ We are told that "as by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one, shall many be made righteous."§ And the doctrine of his atoning death is especially insisted on, because it is at once essential to our salvation, and peculiarly opposed by the pride of the carnal heart. Thus we are informed that "he hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree;"¶ and that "we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of God's grace." Indeed there is no truth more abundantly inculcated throughout the sacred oracles, or in a manner less capable of misconstruction, than this of our acceptance with God only by the meritorious obedience and sufferings of his Son Jesus Christ. We are, therefore, to require all men, the great, the wise, the honourable, as well as the abject, the ignorant, the abandoned, to bow before the feet of our Redeemer, and renouncing every other hope, to implore the mercy of God through the righteousness of his Son.— We are to encourage the contrite and penitent to take refuge from the storms of divine wrath by faith in the Lord Jesus, whose arms are graciously open for the reception of every returning prodigal. For "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."†† Such is the doctrine of justification by the righteousness of Christ. And what hosts of opponents has it excited in the world through every age! The philosophers of vanity amuse them-

* Rom. v. 18.

* 1 Tim. iii. 16.

† Rom. x. 4.

‡ Gal. iii. 13.

† Jer. xxiii. 6; & xxxiii. 16.

§ Rom. v. 18, 19.

 Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14.

†† John iii. 16.

selves with captious objections against the acknowledged mystery of the incarnation ; and against the justice of a vicarious satisfaction, as if they knew better than the Omniscient upon what principles it befits him to support his laws or dispense his mercy. The proud reject with contempt the mortifying terms of the gospel. The decent and honourable cleave to their beloved morality, such as it is ; and leave it to publicans and harlots to glory, if they please, in a crucified Saviour. In the mean time, the great mass of mankind, busied with worldly pursuits and blind to their dreadful condition, turn away with disgust or indifference from all the kind admonitions and invitations of divine mercy, and crowd the broad road to eternal destruction. For these things, brethren, our souls should weep in secret places.— But the faithful preacher will not therefore be ashamed of the gospel of Christ, nor cease to proclaim the good tidings with all perseverance. For though “ the preaching of the cross is to them that perish foolishness ; unto us who are saved it is the power of God.”* And it is by the preaching of the cross that God will in due time gather the whole number of his elect, to rejoice in his presence forever and ever.

A fourth doctrine well suited to exercise faithfulness in the pulpit is that of effectual grace in conversion. Considering the total depravity of our fallen nature, it is reasonable to suppose that any method of salvation revealed from heaven must include a great change in our moral tempers and conduct. But more particularly, the gospel requires repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ as absolutely prerequisite, though not meritoriously contributive, to our justification. Now repentance and faith are holy acts of the soul. And whence shall sinful man derive the dispositions implied in the performance of them? Should we flatter our hearers that they may very easily create these dispositions in themselves with a little assistance from above, the pride of their hearts would be soothed ; and we might throw out now and then a cursory hint about divine assistance to their own endeavours, without incurring much of their resentment or opposition. But if we look into the scriptures we shall find that God hath given us in charge a very different doctrine on this subject. He does indeed require, and we are to require in his name, that sinners return to him without delay, by a genuine repentance and a cordial faith in Jesus Christ. For this is their duty as well as their interest ; and they are under no natural inability to comply immediately with the injunction. But “they that are in the flesh cannot please God ;” * for “the carnal mind is enmity against God ; †” and we are all by nature spiritually dead, “dead in trespasses and sins.” ‡ We are, therefore, abundantly taught to ascribe our conversion to the gracious agency of God as its proper and only efficient cause ; or more strictly speaking, to the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit whose peculiar office it is in the economy of redemption. Thus our Lord asserts in the most emphatical manner that “we must be born again, born of the Spirit ; otherwise we cannot see nor enter into the kingdom of God.” § It is by the operation of the Spirit that we believe to the saving of the soul ; for “no man can say that Jesus is the Lord but by the Holy Ghost.” ¶ In fine, “we are washed, we are sanctified, we are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and by the Spirit of our God.”  Such is the account which the scriptures give us of the origin of our conversion to God. Like the other doctrines of the gospel it is perfectly adapted to our deplorable situation. But at the same time, like those other doctrines its direct tendency is to exalt the grace of God at the expense of human pride and self-sufficiency. We are not to be surprised, therefore, if we meet with much opposition in preaching it to the world. Some find much matter for impious sneering in the unsearchable mysteriousness of the Holy Spirit’s operations. Others, calling themselves the best and most enlightened friends of divine truth, either ignorantly or wilfully reject the doctrine, evident as it is, of effectual, distinguishing grace ; and maintain that God only makes certain exhibitions of the gospel to the minds of men, and to the minds of all alike ; leaving it to their own self-determining wills finally to decide whether or not those exhibitions of truth shall issue in their conversion. And the great multitude of profane and sensual sinners treat with scorn the whole doctrine of conversion and the work of the spirit in it ; charging upon it all the wild and lamentable extravagancies which enthusiasts and impostors have practised under the abused name of experimental religion. What then shall we do in the midst of so much contempt and opposition ? Shall we join with those who unscripturally represent the grace of God as depending for its efficacy on the will of man? Shall we avoid the odious charge of enthusiasm or hypocrisy by saying with our infidel adversaries that the effectual working of God's mighty power in the soul is only the dream of a disordered imagination? God forbid! No; let us preserve and inculcate the truth delivered to us with unwavering resolution and constancy; assuring ourselves that our God will bear his invincible testimony to it in the hearts of as many as he hath chosen to eternal life.

* 1 Cor. i. 18.

* Rom. viii. 8.† Eph. ii. 1.¶ 1 Cor. xii. 3.† Rom. viii. 7.§ *John iii. 1 Cor. vi. 11.

In near connexion with this I mention a fifth doctrine as a test of ministerial faithfulness, namely the necessity of a holy life, progressing unto complete sanctification, in order to our reception into God's heavenly kingdom. This is manifestly a leading truth of divine revelation. Christians are called "God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."* We are "taught by the grace of God which bringeth salvation that, denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works."† We are enjoined to "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling;"‡ to "follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord."§ For though our good works have no part in procuring our pardon or title to heaven, they are absolutely necessary as fruits and evidences of our faith, and means of adorning our Christian profession.—Yea, we do not more essentially need to be justified by the righteousness of Christ than we need to be sanctified by his word and Spirit, brought to the full exercise of every holy affection, as a qualification for our enjoyment of eternal felicity. Now it is precisely the holiness of our religion that makes it so disagreeable to the unregenerate part of mankind. Some it drives, or rather they are driven by their own pride, selfishness and sensual passions to infidelity: they love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. Many talk in a vague, unmeaning way about the mercy of God to the world by Jesus Christ, whom they call their Saviour, and whose blessings they presumptuously hope to participate, though they are evidently and even avowedly strangers to the converting and sanctifying grace of

* Eph. ii. 10.

‡ Phil. ii. 12.

† Tit. ii. 11, 12, 13, 14.

§ Heb. xii. 14.

God. But of all shapes which the spirit of opposition to holiness assumes the most odious and impious is that of antinomian professors of religion; who dare to sin because the grace of God abounds, and neglect good works under pretence of honouring the mediatorial work of our Lord Jesus Christ. In direct opposition to the whole current of scripture they have the effrontery to plead the precious doctrines of God's electing love and the sure perseverance of the saints unto eternal life as a justification of their sloth in the duties of Christianity. When we faithfully preach the doctrine under consideration, such persons never fail to raise a mighty cry of complaint; stigmatizing us as legal preachers, disturbers of the peace of God's dear children, and disparagers of his sovereign grace. But let men of corrupt minds say what they will, it becomes every minister of God solemnly to urge that faith in Christ, and to encourage that faith only, which works by love, purifies the heart and overcomes the world. While we assert that it is "not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to the mercy of God that we are saved,"* let us also "affirm constantly that they who have believed in God should be careful to maintain good works;"† yea, that they should "be stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that their labour shall not be in vain in the Lord."‡ The time is coming when all those confident pretenders to religion who are destitute of the evidence of holiness to support their claim shall hear that tremendous rebuke, "I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity."§

The last doctrine by which I shall illustrate the great duty of faithful preaching is that of the eternal punishment of all who die in impenitency. It requires no self-denial to animate the people of God in their Christian warfare by the hope of a blessed immortality. But to proclaim against the wicked the threatenings of the Almighty, to bring before their view the terrors of the judgment-day, is a task which will try our faithfulness indeed; for it is to ourselves much the most painful duty of our ministerial office. The endless punishment of the wicked in hell is a truth taught by the scriptures with abundant evidence. It is often expressly asserted, and follows also by infallible consequence from other doctrines. It will be sufficient, however, for my present purpose to refer to the solemn account of the final judg-

* Tit. iii. 5.

† 1 Cor. xv. 58.

‡ Tit. iii. 8.

§ Matt. vii. 23.

ment given us by the Judge himself, our Lord Jesus Christ. After welcoming the righteous to the kingdom prepared for them, he will say to the wicked, "depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment but the righteous into life eternal."* Here is no room to evade the awful truth. For the very same duration is attributed to the happiness of the righteous and the misery of the wicked: nor does language afford a stronger word to express the eternal existence of God himself. Such then is the fearful doom which awaits impenitent sinners in that state to which they are hastening; the intolerable wrath of God Almighty, the gloom of endless despair, the unremitting tortures of that dungeon where "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth,"† "where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."‡ What volumes of sophistry have been invented to extinguish the fear of everlasting misery by men whose pride and love of sinful pleasure would not permit them to obey the gospel! Some seek refuge in the horrible and most degrading hope of annihilation. Others labour to believe that sin is a trifle which cannot possibly deserve a perpetual punishment; or that all the holy attributes of Jehovah shall, for the sake of obstinate rebels, be absorbed in his mercy, which will bring their punishment sooner or later to an end. Many make light of eternal damnation without pretending to reason at all on the subject. And multitudes who profess to believe the doctrine as we do are yet so little impressed by it that they easily procrastinate all serious concern about it, and are offended with us for sounding in their ears the terrors of the Lord. Thus do sinners slumber and dream on the brink of perdition.—It is our duty, brethren to awake them, if possible, from this fatal security. Let us refute their sophistry when it needs to be refuted; let us pity their folly, forgive their blind resentment, and with all compassion and importunity warn them to fly from the wrath to come. Let not their charging us with harshness and severity deter us from dealing honestly with them. Their precious souls are in danger.—There is yet hope concerning them; but it may soon be over, and they may sink beyond the reach of mercy. Undesirable as it is to a benevolent mind to cause pain, the faithful preacher will not shrink from the task when it becomes necessary: and a certain holy sternness of denunciation,

* Matt. xxv. 41, 46.

† Matt. viii. 12

‡ Mark ix. 44.

mingled with persuasive tenderness, will often be the highest proof he can give of his concern for the salvation of his hearers.

Thus far concerning faithfulness in preaching the doctrines of God's word.

It remains to be observed, in the second place, that the faithful preacher will be equally sincere, equally unmoved by opposition, in the display and inculcation of practical religion.

As every doctrine which the scriptures teach is in some way or other a practical principle, and the practice of religion follows naturally from its doctrines, it may appear to a superficial observer that the whole work of the sacred desk is sufficiently discharged by doctrinal instruction. But no man can think so who is tolerably acquainted with human nature. Our hearers need as much, and for the same reasons, our faithful labour to exhibit and impress the duties of the Christian life as to unfold and establish the doctrines on which those duties are founded. For the one purpose as well as the other "precept must be upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little."*—Hence the book of God is at least as much occupied in practical as in doctrinal preaching. Divine truths, therefore, should be preached with an evident and avowed view to practice. With their discussion in the pulpit we should always unite more or less of their application to the heart and life, of earnest warnings against sin and exhortations to holiness. Yea, so important are things of this kind that they ought frequently to be made principal subjects of our publick discourses. And probably it is in this branch of preaching that our faithfulness will be most severely tried. Any divine truth handled with a frigid abstraction from practical consequences will excite but little resentment; and indeed, in the generality of hearers, but little attention. But when we strenuously join the practice with the theory of religion in our sermons the effect will be very different. The wicked of every description hate and oppose the doctrines of the gospel for the very same reason that Christians love them, namely that they are doctrines according to godliness. This matter will be better understood by entering a little into particulars.

The first constituent of practical religion is the exercise of holy affections. These are the primary fruits of the Holy Spirit's renovating and sanctifying work by the applicati-

* Isa. xxviii. 10.

ment given us by the Judge himself, our Lord Jesus Christ. After welcoming the righteous to the kingdom prepared for them, he will say to the wicked, "depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. And these shall go away into everlasting punishment but the righteous into life eternal."* Here is no room to evade the awful truth. For the very same duration is attributed to the happiness of the righteous and the misery of the wicked: nor does language afford a stronger word to express the eternal existence of God himself. Such then is the fearful doom which awaits impenitent sinners in that state to which they are hastening; the intolerable wrath of God Almighty, the gloom of endless despair, the unremitting tortures of that dungeon where "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth,"† "where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched."‡ What volumes of sophistry have been invented to extinguish the fear of everlasting misery by men whose pride and love of sinful pleasure would not permit them to obey the gospel! Some seek refuge in the horrible and most degrading hope of annihilation. Others labour to believe that sin is a trifle which cannot possibly deserve a perpetual punishment; or that all the holy attributes of Jehovah shall, for the sake of obstinate rebels, be absorbed in his mercy, which will bring their punishment sooner or later to an end. Many make light of eternal damnation without pretending to reason at all on the subject. And multitudes who profess to believe the doctrine as we do are yet so little impressed by it that they easily procrastinate all serious concern about it, and are offended with us for sounding in their ears the terrors of the Lord. Thus do sinners slumber and dream on the brink of perdition.—It is our duty, brethren to awake them, if possible, from this fatal security. Let us refute their sophistry when it needs to be refuted; let us pity their folly, forgive their blind resentment, and with all compassion and importunity warn them to fly from the wrath to come. Let not their charging us with harshness and severity deter us from dealing honestly with them. Their precious souls are in danger.—There is yet hope concerning them; but it may soon be over, and they may sink beyond the reach of mercy. Undesirable as it is to a benevolent mind to cause pain, the faithful preacher will not shrink from the task when it becomes necessary: and a certain holy sternness of denunciation,

* Matt. xxv. 41, 46.

† Matt. viii. 12

‡ Mark ix. 44.

mingled with persuasive tenderness, will often be the highest proof he can give of his concern for the salvation of his hearers.

Thus far concerning faithfulness in preaching the doctrines of God's word.

It remains to be observed, in the second place, that the faithful preacher will be equally sincere, equally unmoved by opposition, in the display and inculcation of practical religion.

As every doctrine which the scriptures teach is in some way or other a practical principle, and the practice of religion follows naturally from its doctrines, it may appear to a superficial observer that the whole work of the sacred desk is sufficiently discharged by doctrinal instruction. But no man can think so who is tolerably acquainted with human nature. Our hearers need as much, and for the same reasons, our faithful labour to exhibit and impress the duties of the Christian life as to unfold and establish the doctrines on which those duties are founded. For the one purpose as well as the other "precept must be upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little and there a little."*—Hence the book of God is at least as much occupied in practical as in doctrinal preaching. Divine truths, therefore, should be preached with an evident and avowed view to practice. With their discussion in the pulpit we should always unite more or less of their application to the heart and life, of earnest warnings against sin and exhortations to holiness. Yea, so important are things of this kind that they ought frequently to be made principal subjects of our publick discourses. And probably it is in this branch of preaching that our faithfulness will be most severely tried. Any divine truth handled with a frigid abstraction from practical consequences will excite but little resentment; and indeed, in the generality of hearers, but little attention. But when we strenuously join the practice with the theory of religion in our sermons the effect will be very different. The wicked of every description hate and oppose the doctrines of the gospel for the very same reason that Christians love them, namely that they are doctrines according to godliness. This matter will be better understood by entering a little into particulars.

The first constituent of practical religion is the exercise of holy affections. These are the primary fruits of the Holy Spirit's renovating and sanctifying work by the application of divine truth; and include all that judicious Christians mean by experimental religion. It is abundantly evident that the scriptures lay the greatest stress on the state of the affections in estimating our character and standing in the sight of God. The whole law of God, by which our practice is to be regulated, is briefly summed up by our Lord in these two great precepts directed immediately to the heart. "that thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."* And the Apostle teaches us in emphatical language that no attainments in knowledge or zeal, no sacrifices however extraordinary, will render us acceptable to God without love in the heart. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling symbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy and understand all mysteries and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."†—"The fruit of the spirit," says the same Apostle, "is love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, faith, goodness, meekness, temperance."‡ The faithful preacher, therefore, will carefully explain the nature and warmly urge the necessity of holy affections, of genuine experimental religion. He will insist on right tempers, dispositions and motives of the heart, as essentially requisite to sanctify our intellectual knowledge and render our actions pleasing to God. In executing this task we are to expect great and trying opposition. Besides the host of infidels and sensualists, who feel and express the bitterest enmity against all inward religion, we shall find even among professing Christians two classes of persons who will put our stedfastness on this point not a little to the test. The first consists of cold formalists, who rely on the supposed orthodoxy of their creed and the regularity of their external deportment as sufficient to carry them to heaven.—Their prejudices prevent them from distinguishing or aiming to distinguish between genuine religious experience and its contemptable counterfeits. From such persons we shall receive the odious character, of enthusiasts, franticks and madmen at the very mention of an experimental work of grace in the soul : and if they dared, they would pronounce one half of their bible mere rant and delusion. The other class consists of enthusiasts properly so called ; people who, under pretence of supernatural impulses and immediate revelations from heaven, disdain to be enlightened by the ordinary means of instruction ; who work themselves up to a frenzy of violent, irrational feelings, which they call conversion, the love of God, joy in the Holy Ghost, and in which they place the whole of religion. If we faithfully labour to correct these wild and dangerous notions ; if we assert that the work of grace may exist in various degrees and be carried on by various methods in the souls of men ; if we represent religious affection as a reasonable service founded upon knowledge and accompanied by reflection ; if we describe love to God and love to our neighbour as deliberate, steady principles of action rather than occasional ebullitions of passion ; we shall be vilified by these self-styled monopolists of seraphick love as strangers to that new birth which comes from heaven and enemies to vital piety. We shall be counted preachers artificially formed by men in colleges of human learning, base idolaters of money or of fame, not called of God to the ministry of his gospel. These are indeed trials of our patience. But we are not permitted therefore to shrink from our duty. Even what our God hath said on this important subject, that are we to speak ; maintaining and guarding the scriptural religion of the heart against all the attacks of empty formalists on the one hand and of deluded enthusiasts on the other.

* Isa. xxviii. 10.

* Matt. xxii. 37, 38, 39. † 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2, 3.

‡ Gal. v. 22, 23.

A second branch of practical preaching is the delineation of the particular duties prescribed by the gospel, with pressing exhortation to their performance. It is not enough that we explain and enforce holy affections or dispositions of the heart. These are general principles of conduct ; and we must carefully admonish and assist our hearers in the application of them to particular cases. This position is so abundantly exemplified in the holy scriptures that any formal proof of it here is deemed unnecessary. Let me observe that we ought especially to insist upon those duties of the Christian life which are of primary importance in themselves ; those which are most disagreeable to depraved nature, and therefore most readily and generally neglected ; those which are most discountenanced by the maxims and fashions of this ungodly world. Take as examples, the regular exercises of divine worship in the family and the closet ; the sanctification of the Lord's day ; the religious education of children and servants ; the rigid government of the tongue ; watchfulness over our thoughts and desires ; strict integrity in all our dealings with others, doing to them as we would have them do to us ; generous activity in relieving the distresses of our fellow creatures ; forgiveness and love of our enemies ; moderation in the pleasures of appetite and fancy ; firmness, zeal and self-denial in promoting religion and good morals. These and all other duties of Christianity we are faithfully to urge at the expense of being reproached as precise, superstitious and illiberal. Directing our hearers to the grace of the Holy Spirit, by which alone they can serve God acceptably, we must constantly explain and inculcate the divine injunction that they "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God."* One of the best means to accomplish this purpose is to exhibit the example of the blessed Jesus, dwelling with diligent particularity on all its imitable features ; and peremptorily excluding from the hope of heaven all who refuse to walk as he walked, "who went about doing good,"† "who was holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners."‡ Ought I not to add under this head that we are not to relinquish the inculcation of any duty for the sake of avoiding a conflict concerning it with some whom we may acknowledge in the general as our Christian brethren? Take as a specimen the duty of household baptism, as instituted by the Head of the church and practised by his Apostles. While we conscientiously maintain and observe this important ordinance of the gospel, what incessant, what vehement hostility have we to encounter from a certain branch of the Christian community ! Such controversies are far from being agreeable to any who love concord and quietness. What then shall we do in such cases? Shall we tamely yield up truth and duty for the sake of a deceitful peace? No ; Christian charity does not require, ministerial fidelity does not permit the surrender. Let us speak the truth in love ; but let us speak it with boldness. We ought, indeed, to withstand error so much the more earnestly, as it arrogates the garb of superior sanctity, and spreads its baneful influence through the very church of Christ, the nursery of truth and righteousness.

The last article of practical preaching which I shall mention is the explicit reprehension of the particular sins of the people. If some ministers shrink from this work through motives of worldly policy, a few others seem to be sincerely of opinion that it is a matter of little or no importance.— Convert the heart to God, say they, and the love and practice of sin will be banished of course. Now it is true that if the heart be converted to God the love of sin can no longer be its reigning principle. But it is not true that real converts are placed at once beyond the need of information, warning and reproof in regard to particular transgressions. Yea, those who have made considerable progress in religion do evidently still need the monitory voice of their pastors to guard them from danger, or to reclaim them from their occasional aberrations. Besides; the first step towards the conversion of sinners to God through Jesus Christ is to convince them as impressively as possible of their great guilt and depravity. And how is this to be accomplished? Shall we content ourselves with proclaiming in general terms the doctrine of the fall, the total alienation of the human heart from God and righteousness? Is it not manifestly necessary that we proceed to exemplify the doctrine and enforce it on the consciences of our hearers by charging them with the particular transgressions of which we know them to be guilty? Certainly the bible abounds with this kind of preaching, according to divine injunction. “Cry aloud,” said Jehovah to his prophet, “spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and shew my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins.”* The preacher, therefore, is bound faithfully to notice and reprove the vices of the time and place in which his lot may be cast. Unpleasant as we may find the task to be, either in itself or in the consequences which it may draw upon us, our regard to God and our own consciences, as well as our compassion to our hearers, utterly forbids our neglecting it, or performing it in a hasty and superficial manner. If any sinful practice is supported by fashion and numbers, we are for that very reason to engage the more frequently and exert the more energy in its exhibition and censure. Such vices are profane cursing and swearing; violation of the sabbath; gaming in its various branches; duelling; unrighteous methods of gaining money, and extravagant ones of expending it. What is to become of the world if the clergy are too timid to attack these and a thousand other prevailing iniquities in their strong holds? Many say they do not wish to be frightened into religion. Alas, it is too obvious that multitudes will neither be frightened nor persuaded into it. But if fear be, as it undoubtedly is, one of the handles of the human soul, we must seize it, if possible, with a vigorous grasp; proclaiming the wrath of God, the fire of eternal damnation, against every sinner who refuses to repent and obey the gospel. If transgressors calculate on exemption from the denunciations of the pulpit on account of their wealth, talents or elevated stations, we are to disappoint their arrogant hopes by our impartiality. And this we should do the more promptly as the vicious examples of such persons are the more apt to spread corruption around them. It was to an arbitrary monarch in the midst of his sycophants that the prophet who has furnished my text denounced the vengeance of the Almighty: Above all, if any who call themselves disciples of Christ practise sin, under the pretext of Christian liberty, unavoidable infirmity, or the smallness of the fault, we are to warn them of their danger with all speed and sincerity, and strain every nerve to snatch them from the dreadful precipice on which they stand. In a word, while meekness, love and due respect to the people accompany all our words and actions, as well in the pulpit as out of it, let us never forget that we are the responsible messengers of God to his creatures; and that against all sin, whatever shapes or excuses it may assume, we are to carry on an unremitting war, a war of absolute extermination. The performance of this duty will greatly try our firmness and self-denial. Some will sneer at our zeal about what they ignorantly account trifles. Others, filled with bitter resentment, will raise a mighty cry against us for throwing out personal reflections, which is the name they give to honest reproofs, and will wonder how we presume to deal with them so plainly. The gay and fashionable will revile us for attacking their favourite but pernicious amusements. And antinomian professors of religion will stigmatize us as departing from the glorious grace of the gospel. Our temporal support from the people may be diminished, or even totally withdrawn: We may lose friendships dearer to us than silver or gold. It is needful that we keep our minds in a state of preparation for these painful consequences, or whatever others God may suffer our faithfulness in this and other respects to bring upon us. Times have been when his ministers were called to lay down their lives for doing their duty. Through divine grace they "counted not their lives dear to themselves, so that they might finish their course with joy and the ministry which they had received of the Lord Jesus."* After their example we ought to suffer cheerfully every distress which can be inflicted by the ungodly rather than forfeit an approving conscience and the smiles of our heavenly Father.

* Mic. vi. 8.

† Acts x. 38.

‡ Heb. vii. 26.

* Isa. lviii. 1.

I cannot close my survey of ministerial fidelity without reminding you that after all our utmost exertions the success of our labours depend entirely upon the sovereign pleasure of God. Our talents; our improvements in knowledge, our time and our strength are gifts of his bounty.— We need his grace continually to make us faithful in his service. And it is only by the influences of his Holy Spirit that our best performances in the sanctuary can become in any degree instrumental to the conversion and salvation of the people: “ Paul may plant, Apolles may water, but God giveth the increase.”* It is, therefore, no small part of our duty as faithful servants of God that we cultivate in ourselves the profoundest humility, the most impressive conviction of our dependence upon his mercy. Constant and fervent prayer to the Father in the name of his Son Jesus Christ should accompany all our preparations for the pulpit, and every discharge of its exercises; that we may be made in some good measure able and worthy ministers of the new testament, and that our labours may be rendered effectual to the glory of God, and the eternal welfare of our hearers.

III. And now, brethren, it only remains to suggest very briefly the motives which urge you to this great duty of faithfulness in the sacred office. As you have imposed the task, you will candidly receive the word of exhortation from a brother younger than most of you in years and in the ministry. You will suffer one who would feel greater pleasure in sitting as a learner at your feet to stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

Consider then, in the first place, your engagements to God. Besides his rich grace in our conversion, each of us, probably, may have experienced some remarkable and obligatory interpositions of his kind providence, contributing to form our call to the holy ministry. It is proper to bring such things often into serious and thankful review. But more especially, we ought habitually to reflect, each for himself, on that solemn hour when we formally took the office upon us, and received in the appointed order our commission for its execution. How awful was the transaction! With what lowly self-abasement, what sincere resolutions, what earnest petitions for strength from above, what tremling solicitude for the event, did we promise to our God, before his ministers, his people and the world, that we would "be zealous and faithful in maintaining the truths of the gospel and the purity and peace of the church, whatever persecution or opposition might arise unto us on that account!" Should we then fail through sloth, pusillanimity or a worldly spirit, it would be no common precept disobeyed, no common promise broken, but a vow of the most sacred nature shamefully violated. How enormous would be the guilt, how dreadful the consequences! Do we value consistency of character? Do we regard the peace of our own breasts, the approbation of our God? Then let us by his strengthening grace be faithful in the ministry with which he has condescended to invest us, and which we have so solemnly undertaken to perform.

* 1 Cor. iii. 6.

Again; consider the vast number and dismal condition of unconverted sinners. The whole world, we know, is fallen from God, and lieth in wickedness and ruin. Many nations are at this hour involved in gross heathen darkness, brutalized by innumerable abominations. But turn your view nearer home. The wretched slaves of sin, the captives of the devil, surround you on every side. They are your fellow citizens, your neighbours, your friends, your kindred. In the veins of some of them flows, perhaps your own blood. Estranged from God, forgetful of death and judgment, they rush forward heedless and undismayed; filling up the measure of their iniquities, while the Almighty is preparing his sword of vengeance to cut them off, and hell from beneath opens to receive them at their coming. One or another sinks every day; and none is sure of being spared a single hour. Does not the benevolent heart bleed at such a scene? Does it not anxiously inquire, is there any way to save these infatuated destroyers of themselves, any means to pluck them as brands from the burning? Can I be instrumental, and if so, in what way, to rescue immortals from perdition? I answer, it is possible for every Christian to be instrumental in this blessed work by prayer, a holy example and the diligent discharge of the duties of his station. But to you especially, ye ministers of the gospel, is the glorious office assigned, under God, of saving souls alive. And you are to do it principally by faithful preaching. And can we be remiss, can we slumber in circumstances so interesting? Have not we ourselves tasted the wormwood and the gall of sin? Do we not know the terrors of the Lord? Let us reflect before we enter the pulpit, and while we stand in it, that we are warning sinners to fly from the wrath to come, the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. Tremendous words! No heart can conceive their full import. And must every soul that dies unconverted and unpardoned bear the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God without intermission or hope of release to all eternity? Surely if we have any bowels of compassion such considerations will make us faithful in proclaiming to our hearers their danger and the remedy provided for them in the gospel.

Farther; consider what great things have been done and suffered by Christ the Son of God for the salvation of sinners. To animate our zeal, as well as for a thousand other reasons, let us meditate often on his humiliation, his life and his death. He was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities. Let us accompany him in thought to the garden of his agony, to the unrighteous tribunal of his enemies, to the mount where he was crucified. How complicated, how poignant were his sufferings! Yet all the cruel indignities which he endured from men, all the bodily tortures of the scourge, the thorns and the cross, were small things when compared with the weight of his Father's wrath which he bore in our stead. Surely none but an infinite mind can fully conceive the horrors of that hour when he cried, my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me! At such a time it was right, it was decorous that the earth should tremble and the sun shroud his face in darkness.— With what meekness did the Lamb of God drain the bitter cup of divine indignation to the dregs! Then having pronounced the mighty work of redemption finished, he bowed his sacred head and died. Such love did the Son of God exercise towards perishing sinners, towards us and our brethren of the fallen race. And can we be unfaithful in our ministry with such an example before our eyes? I trust I may boldly answer, it is impossible. Blessed Jesus! We will persevere in calling and training the souls redeemed by thy blood. We will bury, we will forget our little grievances and troubles at the foot of thy cross. We will rejoice in being counted worthy to suffer shame for thy sake.

Finally; consider the glorious reward which awaits the faithful minister. Let none contemn this as a narrow, mercenary motive. To seek our own happiness in advancing the glory of God and the salvation of mankind is the very reverse of a mercenary conduct. In this view our divine Master himself had respect to the joy that was set before him, when he endured the cross, despising the shame. Probably it rarely happens that a servant of God preaches his word faithfully without seeing, sooner or later, some good fruit of his labours. And does not the conversion of one soul abundantly compensate years of toil and suffering? Faithful minister of Christ, I appeal to thy heart: could crowns, and empires give thee such exquisite delight as thou hast tasted in the consciousness of being instrumental to the conversion of a single soul? I know thy answer.— But look beyond this fleeting scene to the heavenly world, where the people of God, and especially his ministers, rest from their labours, and their works follow them. There shall they who have turned many to righteousness shine as the stars forever and ever. Yet as success is not at our command, as it is in no sense personally ours, but the work and gift of God alone; it shall not be the measure by which he will dispense the rewards of his grace to them who love and serve him. He knows every heart; and his people shall receive at his hands according to that which they have honestly intended and laboured to do for his glory, whether their aims were accomplished or not. How diminutive will our present sorrows and sacrifices appear in that day when, standing on the threshold of our Father's house above, we shall hear that transporting sentence, well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

I cannot persuade myself to conclude this discourse without addressing a few words to the people. You see the comprehensive and awful task which lies before your ministers. Remember, I beseech you, that every duty enjoined upon them implies a corresponding and equally indispensable duty on your part. If they are God's messengers to you and ambassadors of Jesus Christ; you are required to behave towards them with respect and love suitable to their office. How strongly does our Lord express himself on this subject: "he that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me, and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me."* If it is the duty of your pastors to devote their time and their faculties to your spiritual service in the work of the ministry; it is your duty to render them such a comfortable temporal maintenance as the Lord hath ordained, and as he may enable you to afford. If they are to preach to you faithfully the doctrines of revealed truth, which are able to make you wise unto salvation; you are to hear them, not indeed with blind submission, but with attention and docility, with unprejudiced love of the truth, with humble prayer to God that by their instructions you may grow daily in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. If they are to teach you the good and the right way of practical religion, insisting on holiness of heart and life, leading you in the path of duty and warning you against the allurements of sin: you are to receive their admonitions and reproofs in the spirit of meekness and obedience. If they are tried with afflictions in the execution of their ministerial functions; you are to strengthen their hands and comfort them, crying earnestly to God that he may bestow his blessings and consolations upon them. Of all the rich gifts of God's beneficent providence to the world a faithful ministry is one of the most precious in itself and important in its consequences: and the people who enjoy it are to answer for it at the great day of judgment accordingly.— Let ministers and people imprint the awful lesson deeply on their hearts that they are to meet at the tribunal of Almighty God, there to render an impartial account of their respective actions, and to receive according to that which they have done, whether it be good or evil. Hear the word of the Lord on this most interesting subject: "O son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me. When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thine hand. Nevertheless, if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity, but thou hast delivered thy soul."* May God of his infinite mercy grant to us all, preachers and hearers, that we may render up our final account with joy and not with grief; and that we may receive together an internal inheritance of glory in his heavenly kingdom through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

* Luke x. 16.

* Ezek. xxxiii. 7, 8, 9.

To the truly serious christians of all denominations.

THE HUMBLE PETITION OF SABBATH-DAY.

Showeth,

THAT your petitioner is of very ancient and honourable extraction, being created directly after the world and man were formed; and that your petitioner, immediately after his formation, was blessed and sanctified by his Creator.*

That your petitioner was highly honoured many thousand years after his creation, insomuch that a man who presumed to degrade your petitioner by gathering a few sticks, was put to death without mercy.†

That a blessing was promised to all who gave due honour to your petitioner.‡

That your petitioner continued to be honoured and esteemed till within a few hundred years ago.

That since that period your petitioner has been gradually deprived of the honour due unto him, notwithstanding the promises and threatenings held out to those who should honour or dishonour your petitioner.

That your petitioner is now held in so little estimation, that he is obliged by the rich to serve them for routs, concerts, and other fashionable amusements; by some he is used for working a windmill; by some for printing newspapers and selling them; by some for keeping open shop, and selling shoes and other things; by some for corn-porters to work on; by some for driving cattle to market; by some for digging up gardens; by some for driving stage coaches; by some for watermen to ply on; by butchers for selling meat; by a vast number for administering to their pleasures, and many other degrading employments, which your petitioner was by no means created for.

That for those things great wrath and judgments may be expected; and that by dishonouring your petitioner many persons have come to an untimely end.

That your petitioner is grieved to the heart to see such vast numbers of people obnoxious to the divine wrath and displeasure of an omnipotent God, by the dishonour they cast on your humble petitioner.

That, a short time ago, a society was formed to endeavour to restore your petitioner to the honour he has been deprived of: but that no visible effect has appeared from their exertions.

* Gen. ii. 3. † Num. xv. 36. ‡ Isa. lviii. 13.

Therefore, your petitioner humbly prays you to take his case into your most serious consideration, and that you use your utmost endeavours to restore to your petitioner that honour he has been so unjustly deprived of, and thereby avert the divine displeasure, which now hangs over the nation for these things. And your petitioner, &c. &c.
(English Magazine.)

—:~:—

ANTIQUITIES.

AMONG the many religious institutions of the Jewish church, the Sabbath, or rest on the seventh day, was among the most important, and peculiarly characteristic of that nation. There were three sorts of Sabbaths, or times of rest, among the Jews; the Sabbath of the seventh day in each week, and called emphatically the Sabbath day; the Sabbatical year, or every seventh year; and the Jubilee, which was celebrated at the end of seven times seven years.

The Sabbath, properly so called, was a festival instituted by God, in commemoration of the creation of the world which was finished on the sixth day, as appears from the book of Genesis, and also from the law of Moses, wherein it is said, that in six days, God made the heaven and the earth, and rested on the seventh day. The reasons for this institution appear to have been; first to preserve the remembrance of the creation of the world, and thereby to prevent idolatry, by setting that day apart for the public service of the Creator of all things; secondly to give man and beast one day of respite and rest every week. But with regard to the people of Israel or the Hebrew nation, the Sabbath was established for an additional reason, not only to acknowledge and worship the God of Heaven as the creator and preserver of all creatures, but also particularly to celebrate the memory of their miraculous deliverance out of Egypt and from the tyranny and persecution of Pharaoh, by whom they had been so grievously oppressed. This additional reason is expressly given in Deut. v. 15. Hence the Sabbath is emphatically styled in scripture, a sign between God and the Israelites. But great care should be used to distinguish clearly between the Sabbath of the creation, that of the Jews, and the christian Sabbath.

The first appears to have been a general law of the creator, requiring a seventh part of time for the express purpose of worshipping him alone, as the glorious author of all things and acknowledging that every finite creature was the workmanship of his hands. This was the best preservative against all kinds of idolatry, and had it been strictly kept up in the world we should not have heard of such contradictory and almost incredible accounts of the worship of every species of the vilest beasts, as well as the sun, moon, and stars.— It must be acknowledged, that Moses does not expressly mention the Sabbath before the Israelites leaving Egypt, though he speaks of the number seven being accounted holy, yet it does appear that, however it had been neglected by them, it was kept before the giving of the law. When Moses first mentions it, on the fifteenth day of the second month after leaving Egypt, he does not speak of it as a new thing, but as a subject familiar to them. It was on the circumstances of their having left some of the manna until the morning of the second day, when they found it stinking, yet when they gathered twice the usual quantity on the fifth day, it kept perfectly well two days. This they reported to Moses as contradictory of their previous experience. Moses answers, without other explanations, ‘This is that which the Lord hath said, to-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord, ye shall not then find it in the field &c.’ ‘Six days shall ye gather it, but on the seventh day, the Sabbath, there shall be none.’ Still unbelieving, they went out on the Sabbath to seek for it, but could not find any. This was displeasing to God, and he said unto Moses, ‘How long refuse you to keep my commandments and my laws, see for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days’ &c. &c.—Had not the Sabbath been kept before this, the people would not have understood Moses, without some further explanation why the seventh day differed from the other six. This happened some time before the giving of the law.—The seventh day was reckoned from the day of their leaving Egypt, when their months were altered, and Abib made their first month, their departure being on the first day of that month, to commence at that time on that very account, and as an additional memorial to be celebrated on the Jewish Sabbath. A further evidence that the Sabbath was kept before the Israelites left Egypt is, that there was a day when the family of Adam appeared before the Lord with their offerings. When Cain received his sentence and lamented its consequences, among others, one was that he should be hidden from the presence of the Lord; which, in the language of scripture, means being cut off from his worship.—Noah on certain days offered sacrifices to God. Job also appeared before God and offered sacrifice on a certain day, and it is expressly said, 'there was a day when the sons, or children of God, came to present themselves before the Lord.'

The Heathen nations also formerly observed the like custom of devoting a seventh part of time to religious purposes. Josephus against Appion, about the end of the second book, says 'there is no city, Greek or Barbarian, in which the custom of resting on the seventh day is not preserved, as it is among the Jews.' Clemens Alexandrinus quotes out of Hesiod 'that the seventh day was sacred;' the like out of Homer and Callimachus, to which may be subjoined, what Eusebius has taken out of Aristobulus Lib. 13 cap. 12 'Theoph. Antiochanus to Antolychus concerning the seventh day, which is distinguished by all men.' Suetonius in his Tiberius 32; says Diogenes the Grammarian used to dispute at Rhodes on the sabbath day. Herodotus tells us, in his second book, that the keeping of the seventh day was not a new, but a very ancient custom, and Mr. Selden in his Tract de Jure Nat. and Gent. Lib. 3d. chap. 15, in a very learned manner proves, that the Heathens generally observed one day in seven as a religious day, though the length of time and corruption of manners had greatly obscured, or quite blotted out, the remembrance of the original institution.

The Jewish writers supposed it of general obligation.—Philo calls it the feast, not of one people or country alone, but of the whole universe, de Opismundi, page 15.

The reason for appropriating a seventh part of our time in a special manner to the service of God is applicable to all mankind, and appears to partake of the nature of the moral law. The design of the Sabbath being to keep in remembrance and to celebrate the creation of the world, it ought to be universally received, and forever observed, as the best preservative against ingratitude and idolatry, and the best means of keeping up a sense of the being and power, goodness and mercy of Almighty God. No one can have a true idea of the importance of this institution till he fully contemplates the conduct of those nations who have lost the knowledge or neglected the observance of it. The words used by the Almighty when he instituted the Sabbath, fully imply that the command was to extend to every country and to every age. God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because on that, he rested from his work. That is, God set apart this day and devoted it specially for his service.—This is what is meant by its being a holy day. All the utensils of the temple were holy, that is, set apart for the service of God. There could be no intrinsic holiness in them, but they were separated for the service of a holy God.

But on the introduction of christianity into our world and the rejection of the Jews, we were told that their system was as a branch cut off from the true olive, and that the christian church was grafted into its room. As when the Jewish church succeeded the original or Patriarchal church, or became grafted into it, the additional reason was given that the sabbath should be kept for the commemoration of the great event of their deliverance from temporal bondage, so at the engrafting of the christian church into the same olive, the day was changed to the first day of the week, to commemorate the greater event of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ. Thus the church of God has been one and the same from the beginning; the particular and peculiar institutions, for particular and important purposes, have been added, as specially applicable to a particular dispensation of God's providence.—The Patriarchs kept the sabbath as a memorial of the creating goodness of the one only Almighty God, and his universal providence towards all his creatures.—The Israelites kept it with the same view, and as their deliverer from Pharaoh and all his host, and their guide and creator toward the promised rest in the land of Canaan. The christian adds to these powerful obligations the commemoration of the death and resurrection of his glorious Redeemer, who on this day delivered him from the tyranny and dominion of the spiritual Pharaoh and the bondage of spiritual Egypt and is introducing him to the real and spiritual Canaan, at his second coming in glory, of which the promised land was but a type or shadow.

The christian therefore clearly distinguishes between the sign and the thing signified; and while he rejoices that through the resurrection of his Redeemer, he is delivered from the 'blackness and darkness and tempest, and the sound of a trumpet and the voice of words,' and that 'he is come to Mount Zion and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem,' he is careful to observe the command, by giving unto God his due, not by considering all other days as unholy, but by giving himself up to the service of God and his generation, in all the concerns of life. He also specially sets apart one day in seven to the more immediate worship of Almighty God, through Jesus Christ, that he may know him and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings. But to return. The Jewish sabbath began on Friday about sunset, and ended the next day about the same time. The law so strictly enjoined this rest, that the Jews were not suffered to dress their victuals, nor even to light their fires on this day, but were obliged to prepare these things the day before, which, for this reason, is named the preparation of the sabbath. Both man and beast were obliged to rest and abstain from all servile occupations. It appears from several places of the New Testament, that religious exercises such as reading the law, praying and blessing, were reckoned necessary on the sabbath, but they are not prescribed by the law. Rest however, was enjoined with the utmost strictness, and, that for the reason above mentioned. Circumcision and works of mercy and all occupations relating to the divine service were performed on the sabbath day. Indeed, it was a maxim among the Jews, that there was no sabbath in the sanctuary. They made this day a day of great rejoicing, and as a token of it was the sounding the trumpets at the 9th hour, or 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the Friday, when all at work in the country left off; and again some time after when all working within the city ceased, and shops were shut; the last was at sunset, when they lighted their lamps. They also made great illuminations and every one put on his best garments and dressed over night, a greater quantity of victuals than usual.

L.

From the New-Jersey Gazette.

DEISM.

Read and revere the sacred page, a page
 Where triumphs immortality: a page
 Which not the whole creation could produce,
 Which not the conflagration shall destroy;
 'Tis printed in the minds of Gods forever;
 In nature's ruins not one letter lost—YOUNG.

DID you ever see a man, courteous reader, arrogating to himself the title of philosopher and of a profound thinker, who could not even give a definition of philosophy, nor ever had a serious thought in his life? A man who, with little wit, and much self-conceit was constantly retailing scraps and shreds from Tolland and Tindal, and glorying in the wretched sophistry of those superficial reasoners against the authenticity of the sacred scriptures, but who had never so much as looked into Leland, a celebrated and philosophical divine, who had solidly confuted both?

Have you ever seen a man who ridiculed all faith and all mystery, and expected to obtain eternal felicity by practising morality dictated by the light of nature, acknowledging at the same time his belief of the greatest absurdities in the world ; and practising no more morality than a horse ? A man pretending to the acutest penetration and judgment ; and yet not knowing how to doubt where he ought ; to rest assured where he ought ; and to submit where he ought ?

Did you ever see a man who averred that the bare light of nature was sufficient (and revelation consequently unnecessary) to conduct us at present in the path of duty, and to everlasting happiness hereafter ; and in the same breath confessing, that, notwithstanding this light (luminous and brilliant as he made it) a very great part of the world, that has no other guide, is this moment involved in pagan superstition and idolatry ?

Did you ever see a man who denied the miracles wrought by Jesus Christ, though proved by a cloud of witnesses who sealed their testimony with their blood ; and yet affecting to believe the fabulous wonders of Apollonius of Tyana, upon the credit of Philostratus, who has written a silly romance about that astrologer, which was never believed by any save by those who believe every thing but what is true ?

Did you ever see a man who resolved all the moral attributes of the Deity into that of mercy ; and this mercy into a connivance at sin, and the virtual abolition of his laws ?

Did you ever see a man who flattered himself that the precepts, the morality and the history of our holy religion ; the wonderful and unparalleled life and death of its author ; the wisdom and sanctity of its injunctions ; the authority and sublimity of the sacred writings ; the testimony of ocular witnesses ; the blood of so many martyrs ; the accomplishment of so many prophecies ; the attestation of so many miracles ; the tradition of so many ages ; the conversion of so great a part of the world to a religion renouncing the world, and propagated not only without, but against external force ; the perpetuity of the faith through a perpetuity of the most bloody persecutions ; the impregnable foundation of the church ; and all the proofs in support of christianity, are answered and confuted, or rather totally annihilated by the unphilosophical philosophy of a Bolingbroke, or the wretched pun or threadbare jest of a Voltiare, or a Rousseau ?

Did you ever see a man who had the assurance to tell you, that our belief in the divine origin of the scriptures is wholly to be ascribed to the force of education, and the early illusions of the priest and the nurse ; but that all men of unfettered uninfluenced sentiments, all philosophers and reasoners, have ever esteemed revelation as imposture ; and this man at the same time confessing that sir Isaac Newton, and Mr. Locke, and Lord Bacon, and sir Robert Boyle, and Grotius, and Boerhave, and Littleton, and West, and Pascal, and Penn, and Barclay and Philips, were christians, after the most impartial scrutiny, and the most assiduous investigation of the evidences by which revelation is supported ?

Did you ever see a man who denied the possibility of miracles, and yet demanded a constant series and uninterrupted succession of them, to prove a divine mission ?

Have you ever seen a man who reproached religion with all the horrors of persecution, and the fanaticism of the most sanguinary zealots, and yet acknowledging that these excesses were the evident abuses of christianity ; and directly repugnant to the peaceable spirit of the gospel, and the notorious inhibitions of its illustrious founder ?

Did you ever see a man unable by the light of reason to reconcile the blemishes in the natural, and the disorders in the moral world, with the idea of an all-wise and all-good governor of the universe—some regions for instance, almost deprived of the heat of the sun, others scorched by its insupportable splendor, winds, tempests, and earthquakes, volcanoes, and inundations threatening universal destruction ; the ocean overflowing the greatest part of the globe ; and an immense quantity of its terra firma covered with rocks and mountains, and deserts and sand, incapable of cultivation ; nor apparently formed for the sustenance of man or beast—and this same man able, by revelation to reconcile all this ; and yet scorning by revelation to do it ?

Respecting the moral world—have you ever seen a man unable to account, by the light of reason, how a Being infinitely good and infinitely powerful, should permit sin (which from the purity of his nature he must abhor, and by his omnipotence can certainly prevent) not only to enter into the world, but to be more prevalent in it than virtue—Why he should suffer injustice and tyranny to reign uncontrouled ; oppression and violence to be successful and triumph over prostrate virtue and innocence ; humility to be confounded ; and piety to wander in penury and rags—and able by revelation, to account for all this, and yet scorning by revelation to solve those, otherwise inexplicable difficulties ?

Did you ever see a man, who unable by the light of reason to account for the composition of his own species, as at the same time material and thinking beings, while it is confessedly of the essence of matter to be incompatible with thought—equally unable to account for the double nature in man—his general propensity to vice, and his insuperable veneration for virtue—his videa meliora, proboque, and his deteriora sequor—his unconquerable moral depravity, and the remaining splendid fragments of primæval lustre ; and able by revelation to account for all this ; and yet scorning by revelation to do it ?

Have you ever seen a man, who, unable to prove, by the light of reason; the immortality of the soul, or that, from that intimate union between the operations of the soul and those of the body, the latter ceasing, the former will not terminate ; and able by revelation, which hath brought immortality to light, to prove his eternal duration ; and yet scorning by revelation to prove it ?

Did you ever see a man who, unable by the light of reason to account for his own hopes of immortal happiness, from the absolute impossibility of reconciling, by the help of that light, the immutable justice of the Supreme Legislator, with the impunity of the transgressors of his laws, (for as to the attribute of mercy, it is indubitably borrowed from revelation ; and in the hands of those miserable reasoners, most miserably perverted) and who by revelation could account for it ; and yet scorning thus to solve this, otherwise inscrutable ænigma ?

Have you ever seen such a man, sir——Why then you have seen a——BLOCKHEAD.

Let all the heathen writers join,
To form one perfect book,
Great God, if once compar'd with thine,
How mean their writings look !
Not the most perfect rules they gave
Could shew one sin forgiven,
Or lead a step beyond the grave,
But thine conduct to heaven.....Dr. Watts.

HORTENSIVS.

—:⊙:—
From Fuller's Backslider.

LOVE OF THE WORLD.

ANOTHER way in which a departure from God very often operates, is, by the love of the world.—It is not uncommon for persons who once appeared to be zealous, affectionate, and devoted to God, when they come to be settled in life, and to enter into its necessary avocations to lose all heart for religion, and take no delight in any thing but saving money. This, it is true, is not generally considered by the world as disreputable: on the contrary, provided we be fair in our dealings, it is reckoned a mark of wisdom. Men will praise thee when thou doest well for thyself. Such a one, say they, is a discreet man, and one who knows how to secure the main chance. Yet the scriptures are very decisive against such characters. This is the sin which they denominate the lust of the eye.* The cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, are described as choking the word, and rendering it unfruitful. It is worthy of special notice, that when our Lord had warned his followers to take heed and beware of covetousness, the example which he gives of this sin is not of one that was a plunderer of other men's property, an unfair dealer, or an oppressor of the poor; but of a certain rich man whose ground brought forth plentifully; and whose only object appeared to be, first to acquire a handsome fortune, and then to retire from business and live at his ease.† This also appears to be the character which is blessed by wicked men, but abhorred of God.‡ A man who deals unfairly with men, gains not their blessing but their curse. Men in general regard only themselves: so long therefore as any person deals justly with them, they care not what his conduct is towards God. But it is affecting to think that the very character which they bless and envy, God abhors. The decision of heaven is nothing less than this, if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him.§ So far is the love of this world from being the less dangerous on account of its falling so little under human censure, that it is the more so. If we be guilty of any thing which exposes us to the reproach of mankind, such reproach may assist the remonstrances of conscience, and of God, in carrying conviction to our bosoms; but of that for which the world acquits us, we shall be exceedingly disposed to acquit ourselves.

It has long appeared to me that this species of covetousness will, in all probability prove the eternal overthrow of more characters among professing people than almost any other sin; and this because it is almost the only sin which may be indulged, and a profession of religion at the same time supported. If a man be a drunkard, a fornicator, an

* 1 John ii. 16.

‡ Ps. x. 3.

† Luke xii. 15, 21.

§ 1 John ii. 15.

adulterer, or a liar; if he rob his neighbour, oppress the poor, or deal unjustly, he must give up his pretences to religion; or if not, his religious connexions, if they are worthy of being so denominated, will give him up: but he may love the world, and the things of the world, and at the same time retain his character. If the depravity of the human heart be not subdued by the grace of God, it will operate.— If a dam be placed across some of its ordinary channels, it will flow with greater depth and rapidity in those which remain. It is thus, perhaps, that avarice is most prevalent in old age, when the power of pursuing other vices has in a great measure subsided. And thus it is with religious professors whose hearts are not right with God. They cannot figure away with the profane, nor indulge in gross immoralities: but they can love the world supremely, to the neglect of God, and be scarcely amenable to human judgment.

And whatever may prove the overthrow of a mere professor, may be a temptation to a good man, and greatly injure his soul. Of this the case of Lot, when he parted with Abraham, furnishes an affecting example. When a situation was put to his choice, he lifted up his eyes and beheld all the plains of Jordan, that it was well watered every where; and he took up his residence in Sodom: He had better have dwelt in a wilderness, than among that debauched people: but he consulted worldly advantages, and the spiritual well-being of his family was overlooked. And what was the consequence? It is true, he was a righteous man, and his righteous soul was grieved with the filthy conversation of the wicked from day to day: but he could have very little influence over them, while they, on the contrary, found means of communicating their odious vices to his family. Some of his daughters appear to have been married while in Sodom, and when the city was to be destroyed, neither they nor their husbands could be persuaded to make their escape, and so probably perished in the overthrow.— The heart of his wife was so attached, it seems, to what she had left behind, that she must needs look back; for which she was rendered a monument of divine displeasure. And as to his two single daughters, though they escaped with him to the mountain, yet they had learnt so much of the ways of Sodom as to cover his old age with infamy. This, together with the loss of all his substance, were the fruits of the well-watered plain, which he had fixed his eyes upon, to the neglect of his spiritual interest. Yet how frequently is the same part acted over again. In the choice of settlements for ourselves, or our children, how common is it to overlook the immorality of the place, the irreligiousness of the connexions, or the want of a gospel ministry; and to direct our enquiries only to temporal advantages. From the same principle also many have dealt largely in speculation, and plunged into engagements far beyond their circumstances. The hope of making a fortune, as it is termed, by some lucky hit, draws them into measures which ruin not only themselves, but many who confide in them. That mere worldly men should act in this manner, is not a matter of surprise; but that men professing to fear God should imitate them—this is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation!

ON SELF-ACQUAINTANCE.

THE knowledge of ourselves is important, because without it, we shall never take our proper places, nor gain a sight of our obligations. This knowledge is always a fruit of solemnly calling ourselves to an account, and of carefully watching the exercises of our minds. Who does not know, that two persons may for many years live in the same neighbourhood, and yet be so inattentive to each other, as never to form a particular acquaintance? They may readily recognize each other's features and voices; and at the same time, in an important sense, remain strangers. Equally supportable is it, that a person may live, in this world, a very great stranger to himself. He may be busily employed, all his days, and may even distinguish himself for his exertions to obtain certain ends, which the world may call laudable; and yet never cultivate an acquaintance with his own heart. With all his fame for worldly wisdom, he may have neglected to call himself to an account, as a candidate for eternity; and, of course when summoned to appear before his God, he may find himself awfully deficient in that kind of knowledge, which is the most important.

It is manifest, that they who view themselves as they ought, find time, notwithstanding all the cares of this busy and ensnaring world, to call home their wandering thoughts, and to commune with their own hearts. In this way, the faithful in every age have obtained a sight of their own vileness. Their seasons of retirement and meditation persons of this description have highly regarded. If, through unfaithfulness, they have neglected these seasons, the consequences have always been painful. They have become, as it were, afraid of themselves. They have felt that kind of embarrassment, in renewing an acquaintance with their own hearts, which is felt by two persons, who, for a great length of time, have neglected each other. Conscious of having become strangers, they know not how, at first to use freedom.

To observe seasons of retirement is in compliance with the duty, enjoined by our divine Teacher, of "entering into the closet and of shutting the door." The object of such retirement is meditation, prayer and self-acquaintance; a privilege which has been sought by the true friends of God in every age of the world. Of the patriarch Isaac we read, that "he went out to meditate in the field at the even-tide." Jacob, under his troubles, was alone, all night, wrestling in prayer. David, as appears from his writings, was often employed in thinking on his own ways; or in reviewing his life and examining his heart. To such precious seasons he alluded, when he penned the following words, in the 77th Psalm: "In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord: my soul refused to be comforted. I remembered God, and was troubled: I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Thou holdest my eyes waking: I am so troubled that I cannot speak. I have considered the days of old, the years of ancient times. I call to remembrance my song in the night: I commune with my own heart; and my spirit made diligent search." And in another Psalm: "I thought on my ways and turned my feet unto thy testimonies. I made haste, and delayed not, to keep thy commandments." Had not this pious man, amidst all his cares, reserved some time to commune with his own heart, he would have lived and died, like most other men, a stranger to himself. At the close of an active and laborious life, he might have taken up the sad lamentation. They made me keeper of the vineyards; but mine own vineyard have I not kept.

But we have a brighter example than that of David, or of the patriarchs. The Saviour of the world had his seasons of withdrawing from the multitude, who thronged around him to hear his instructions, and even from the disciples who composed his particular family, that he might commune with God and his own heart. This he viewed an important part of his duty, and, by his example, he has enjoined the same on all his friends.

The hours of retirement and self-examination, which have now been represented to be so important, will, however, fail of being important to those who observe them, unless they are rightly improved. At such seasons, we must have God's holy law in our view. Can we weigh our chaacters, without having recourse to some standard? The great standard, or test of character, is the divine law.— Every character is viewed by the Searcher of hearts to be bad or good, according to this standard. This, therefore, we ought to carry with us to our closets, and places of retirements. Into this we ought carefully to look, as into a glass, that we may know what manner of persons we are.— The law, in its strictness and purity, should be imprinted on our minds. How expressive of a strong attachment to the divine law are the following words of David. “O how love thy law! it is my meditation all the day.” It appears that the law was his delight, not because he expected to obtain salvation by it, but because he saw it to be holy. He loved its perfection and purity. Though by this standard, he stood condemned, yet he was inclined to weigh himself by it; and the more faithfully he attended to this, the greater sense he had of his own imperfection and vileness. He saw the commandment to be exceedingly broad. With all this the experience of the apostle Paul perfectly corresponds. “I had not known sin (said he) but by the law: for I had not known lust except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet. But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead. For I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died.”

From the united testimony of these inspired men David and Paul, we learn that all have been brought to see themselves to be *sinner*s, have gained this knowledge by looking into God's holy law. Many, doubtless, have their seasons of retirement and meditation, who remain exceedingly ignorant of themselves, because when they have entered their closets, they have always neglected to take the divine law with them. Were they now to do this, and to be faithful in comparing themselves with this standard, their imagined attainments in religion might possibly vanish like the morning dew, before the rising sun; and they might tremble as king Josiah did, when he heard the words of the book of the law, which had long been lost. While men suffer themselves to be ignorant of the law, they feel very whole and practically say, that they stand in no need of a physician.

To obtain a knowledge of ourselves, we must also carefully compare our feelings and practice with the requirements of the gospel. The gospel it is true, is good news to sinners. But, does it promise any good to sinners, who remain impenitent? Does it countenance men in their sins? No; the requirements of the gospel are strict, and, like the law, which we have been considering, they try the hearts of men. The language of the gospel is, "He that believeth shall be saved." An infinite favour is here promised, on a certain condition. The condition is, that we renounce all dependence on our own strength, acknowledge ourselves to be in a helpless and hopeless condition, and that we embrace, with our hearts, the all-perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ. Without that faith, which implies all this, what benefit are we to expect from the gospel? None at all; for the gospel, considered as an overture of God to fallen men, threatens as well as promises. Therefore it is added, "He that believeth not shall be damned." The preached gospel, mis-improved, will leave men in a state an hundred fold more to be dreaded than that of the heathen.

Besides; the gospel presents to us many crosses, which we must daily take up, or lose our souls. Speaking on this subject, our divine Saviour said, "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and follow me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it."

With these views of the gospel we should enter our closets, and solemnly ask ourselves, as in the presence of God, whether we have complied with the conditions. If on examination, we find that our faith is not of that kind, which leads to purity of life, and which influences us to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world, what does it profit? If we find that our religion does not consist in self-denial; if it does not make us feel interested in the honor and glory of the divine Redeemer; if it does not make us prize the worship of God in his house, in our families and in our closets; what important end do we expect will be answered by it? The gospel is represented by its divine Author to be a test of character. Men are to know themselves by coming into the light of it. Therefore it is written, "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But, he that doeth truth, cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God."

If the wicked obtain any conviction of their ruined state, it must take place in consequence of comparing themselves with the pure oracles of God, with the law and the gospel. And if Christians are brought to have any just sight of their many imperfections, to lie before God, and to feel the necessity of struggling against sin, they will attain to this, by retiring from the world, and studying the word of God with self-application, and with particular reference to the state of their own souls. Convicted of the greatness of their danger, and of the magnitude of their wants, they are constrained to cry for help, as the publican did, not mentioning their own good deeds, but saying, "God be merciful to us sinners." No longer do they say in their hearts, that their flocks, their merchandize and their earthly companions call so loudly for their attention that God must be put off, and eternal concerns dispensed with; no longer do they say, "To-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant;" but they make haste, and delay not, to keep the divine commandments.—Panoplist.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE ORIGIN OF RELIGIOUS ERRORS.

From a Manuscript by the late Rev. Dr. Joseph Bellamy.

1 WRONG sentiments, in moral matters, are criminal, as well as wrong actions. To think ill of God's real moral character is criminal, as well as to make another God of a different moral character to suit our own hearts. When the Gentiles knew God, they glorified him not as God—they did not like to retain God in their knowledge. Hence they made to themselves gods, such as they liked; and these they glorified, builded temples to their honour, and offered sacrifices to them with pleasure. And had the Israelites liked the moral character of their God, instead of adopting, they would have despised the worthless gods of their neighbors; Rom. i. 21—28; Jer. ii. 5—13. And as the Jews hated the real moral character of their God, so they hated Jesus, who exhibited it to their view; Joh. iii. 19. and xv. 20—24. And as the Christian nations did not receive the truth in the love of it, but had pleasure in unrighteousness, this prepared them to believe a lie, i. e. all the errors of the apostate church of Rome; 2 Thes. ii. Hatred of true morality is the real source of all persecution; Matt. v. 10, 11, 12.

2. All the objections of the human heart against revealed religion originate from dislike to natural religion; Rom. viii. 7, 8, 9. He that loves true morality, will love true Christianity, as soon as he knows it. He that loves the moral law, will love the gospel of Christ. Every honest man will be a Christian, as soon as he hears the word, and understands it; Luke viii. 15; Joh. v. ii. 17; 1 Joh. v. 1.—He who loves the Father, will love his own Son, his express image; Joh. viii. 42.

3. The enemies of Jesus, who hated him with a mortal hatred, alledged a variety of things against him, to keep themselves in countenance ; but our Saviour who was intimately acquainted with the whole affair, and even knew their very hearts, intimated privately to his brethren according to the flesh, who at that time took sides with his enemies, what was the real cause, and the original foundation of all this ill-will towards him. John vii. 7. The world cannot hate you, (as you think and feel as they do;) but me it hateth, because I testify of it, that the works thereof are evil. Even so hath it happened ever since, that though those in Christendom, who have hated and persecuted the true followers of Christ, rejected the true scheme of religion, and invented other schemes to suit their various tastes ; have at all times alledged a great variety of reasons to justify themselves : Yet as Jesus was hated, so real Christianity hath always been hated, because it testifies of the world, that the works thereof are evil. This was the true secret then, and it hath been the true secret ever since ; although, then, Christ Jesus himself was publicly so odious, that those who murdered him, and killed his followers, thought they did God service, and were promoting the cause of morality ; and although it hath frequently been so in ages since. If they persecute me, they will also persecute you: he that hateth me, hateth my Father also. Blessed are they who are persecuted for righteousness sake ; Matt. v. 10. Or, which is the same, for my sake ; v. 11. And this hath been the real ground of all persecution : for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you ; verse 12.

4. Right sentiments concerning the moral character of God, and concerning the moral law, morality, moral obligation, moral agency ; all which belong to natural religion, would prepare us to receive and entertain right sentiments concerning the whole system of revealed religion ; and if all our prejudices against natural religion were removed, we should have no prejudices left against revealed religion.— To be more particular :

5. The real moral character of God, the knowledge of which was lost among the nations of the earth, but is now brought to light in the sacred writings, were it understood and cordially viewed as an absolutely perfect character, would soon convince us that God is fit to sit at the head of the universe, and decree and conduct according to the good pleasure of his will ; and all our objections against his eternal decree and universal providence, would in effect vanish at once, and we should begin to sing, as in Psalm xcvi. 1. The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice. And

6. Right sentiments of the moral law; of true morality; of the nature, extent, and excellence of all that duty which God requireth of man, and of our obligations to yield all that love and obedience which is required of us, together with a feeling that we in fact are moral agents with respect to the whole of that love and duty which is required; would at once prepare us to make a right estimate of the nature and degree of our moral depravity, and of our guilt and ill desert; and of our need of that Redeemer and Sanctifier, and of that pardoning mercy and sanctifying grace, revealed in the gospel; and dispose us with candour to understand scripture words and phrases relative to those subjects, and answer a thousand objections which otherwise will fill our minds.

7. We ought to love God with all our hearts, and our neighbour as ourselves, so as to be influenced and governed by this love in the whole of our conduct; and our obligations hereunto, as they originate from, so they are equal unto the infinite dignity of Him who requires this of us.— Were this understood, and cordially acquiesced in, an end would soon be put to all the disputes about the divinity and satisfaction of Christ, and the eternity of hell's torments; about the nature and necessity of regeneration; of repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ; of justification by free grace, through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ, &c. &c. But,

8. So long as we differ in our sentiments concerning morality, moral obligation, what qualifications are necessary to constitute a moral agent; i. e. in effect, concerning the moral character of God, and of man; we shall not very readily agree in our understanding of any written revelation relative to these matters, let the revelation be ever so full, or ever so plain. Since the increase of learning in Europe, religious disputes have increased, and the number of heretics and infidels greatly multiplied; as if, in proportion to light externally exhibited, the internal vices of the human mind were the more alarmed. The true reason we find in Rom. viii. 7, 8; John iii 19.

9. If we are not bound by the divine law, any farther than our inclination corresponds; then Pharaoh was not bound to let Israel go, notwithstanding the express command of the Almighty; and not the divine law, but every man's inclination, becomes the rule of his duty in all cases whatsoever. If the infinite worthiness of the Deity doth not infinitely oblige us to love and obey him, then sin is not an infinite evil; and an atonement of infinite value, in order to our pardon, is not needed, if any at all ; nor is a Saviour of infinite dignity requisite ; nor will the doctrines of the divinity and satisfaction of Christ, and the eternity of hell's torments, be readily believed, how plainly soever revealed. The passions justify themselves ; and if the feelings of each man's heart ought to be the rule of duty to each man, then it will come to pass, that every way of each man will be right in his own eyes ; and the whole need not a physician. And in these views, and with these feelings, men will not readily understand the Bible, or believe it to contain a revelation from heaven ; and it must be entirely new modeled or totally rejected.

10. When once the Bible is rejected by men, because they do not like to retain God in their knowledge, a new god will be formed, who will approve a new system of morality invented, which will justify the moral character of man, without any need at all of any redeemer, or any sanctifier : and it may now even be said, that any atonement for sin, besides what the sinner himself can make, is inconsistent with the moral character of God ; and that any sanctifier whatsoever, is inconsistent with the character of a man, as a moral agent.

11. Miracles, they will say, are of no use to prove what by their reason they know to be false. Natural religion is the only religion God ever gave to man ; and it is sufficient to secure the welfare of every man, both here and hereafter.

12. Thus, having rejected the true God, and the true morality, from disaffection to both, and framed a system of religion to suit their hearts, they cry peace, peace to themselves, until sudden destruction cometh upon them.

AN EXTRACT FROM NOTES ON THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS WHICH HAVE NOT YET BEEN PUBLISHED.

It has been also objected, "that it is to no purpose to strive, for if we are elected, we shall be saved do what we will, if not we shall miss it (salvation) do what we can."

If this objection supposes faith and holiness to be the mere effects of man's striving independently of the grace of God, it takes as granted that which we cannot admit, and thus being an objection founded on a combination of two irreconcilable doctrines, demands no regard. For every man who embraces the doctrine of election must, if he is consistent, agree that holiness springs from the influence of the holy spirit, which this objection denies, otherwise it would not produce the seeming difficulty.

But if it supposes a man really desirous of salvation, and earnestly in quest of it, this is the effect of grace, and persevering in such effectual desire, he has been elected, he will be saved: and the assertion, that he may notwithstanding, "miss" salvation, not only unscriptural, but the thing is literally impossible.

This plausible objection therefore turns out to be wholly unimportant, because it is either founded upon the supposition of an absurdity, or of an impossibility.

If any were so weak as to hold, that the elect remaining in their sins shall be saved, and that guilty men may become holy and yet miss of salvation, we acknowledge this objection would stand in their way by exposing their absurdities.

Not only does this objection make nothing against the truth of the doctrine of election, but, however malignantly intended, it affords no solid reason for discouragement under, or dissatisfaction with the divine dispensations, as has been often unsuccessfully argued from the analogy that subsists between the kingdoms of nature and of grace: for if every event in the natural world is but the effect of divine power in the execution of his mysterious purposes, and so the times of the deaths of all men are known to God, how uncertain soever with respect to us,* would not the same argument hold thus, I need not strive to live by using the means of life, for if continuance in life is decreed me, I shall live do what I will, if not, I shall die do what I can? The objection is not more futile in the one case, than in the other.

* Job xiv. 5. vii. 1. Psalm. xvi. 5. Acts. xvii. 26.

From the London Evangelical Magazine.

ON THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR.

To the Editor.

SIR,

THE close of a portion of time, which forms an important part of the whole space of human life, naturally invites to reflection. Who, that is at all awake to the momentous events which this gradual succession of periods will doubtless introduce, both with regard to himself and the human race in general, can avoid having his attention arrested by the solemn toll, which announces, as to a year, that it is finished? Hence it has been the practice of the godly, in every age, to take advantage of the admonitory pauses in the great machine of time; and while standing, as it were, on a narrow space, between the irrevocable past, and the impenetrable future, to encourage those considerations which both recollection and anticipation amply furnish.

It is not, Mr. Editor, my intention to recall the whole train of reflections which do, or should, arise in the mind at such a season; but to fix my view on one branch, which you will join with me in thinking, ought to occupy a considerable share of attention. Am I wrong in supposing, that not a few excellent persons, who by no means neglect the duty referred to, while they are becomingly solicitous on the question, What am I? do not apply, with an earnestness due to its importance, that other interesting question, What do I? Were it otherwise, should we not see many, who are only known by the negative qualification of abstinence, from what would derogate from their Christian character, conspicuous for their zeal and active exertions, in promoting the cause they doubtless favour, and for the prosperity of which they daily pray?

In this respect, I am persuaded that many real Christians are verily guilty, without being aware of the culpability of their conduct. It is not enough to keep themselves unspotted from the world; they ought to do all that in them lies to extend the dominion of purity and holiness over that of pollution and sin. Every thing points out the necessity and propriety of such endeavours;—the state of the world;—the ordinary procedure of divine Providence;—the honour God has, in his past operations, put upon the exertions of his servants;—the use he seems determined to make of their instrumentality, in the accomplishment of his future designs;—and the notice he deigns to take of the meanest attempts to promote his glory.

But, in opposition to these motives, it is not uncommon for Indolence and Indifference, concealed under the garb of Humility, to interpose and suggest, "What can I do? my abilities or my opportunities are so small, that all my endeavours must be of no avail." But, such reasoning as this forms no part of the wisdom which comes from above.—However specious it may appear, the plain language is, "I pray thee, have me excused." God has no where said, nor is it probable that he has designed, that his purposes shall be effected by the operation of splendid talents only. How few, in that case, would be sufficient for these things! But, what if we cannot, by the energy of reasoning, make a Felix tremble ; nor by the powers of eloquence, mightily persuade the people,—are we to conclude that we can render no service to the Redeemer's cause? By no means. manifold are the gifts which God has bestowed on men ; and by no one of these, if sanctified, may not his glory be promoted. Intellectual faculties ;—knowledge in any of its multifarious branches ;—excellencies of disposition ;—aptness and facility of language ;—influence arising from station, character property or authority ;—extensive acquaintance with society ;—and the innumerable opportunities which circumstances may render peculiar to the lot of each individual ;—these are so many talents to be employed in the service of God and his gospel, and which we are to occupy till he come.

ABSURDITY OF INFIDELITY.

THOSE who undertake to deny the authenticity of the sacred scriptures are necessarily compelled to maintain the following position :

1st. That certain poor mechanics and fishermen of Judea, without education, and without talents, have formed of themselves the great and dangerous project of changing the religion universally received.

2d. That these men, intended to substitute to Judaism and Paganism another plan of religion, have conceived a system the most sublime, a mode of worship the purest, a religion the most detached from sense, and from any indulgence of passions ; and which best unites all the great principles of theology with those of morals and civil government.

3d. That these same men, who gave such excellent lessons of piety, justice, temperance, rectitude, and charity ; and who to these lessons have, in fact, added a striking example of virtuous conduct, were, however, nothing but cheats, who upheld all their doctrine by falsehood and blasphemy ; making no scruple to offend God, to deceive man, and to precipitate their followers into a gulph of misery.

4th. That these men, who talk and write so sensibly, have been frantic enough to sacrifice themselves in cold blood ; and, with a singular perseverance, to the strange madness of maintaining a glory of which they knew the falsity, and from which they derived neither honor nor advantage.

8th. That, if we take them for madmen or visionaries, we must confess, that to these madmen or visionaries the world is indebted for a work the most difficult, and for the noblest change that ever took place in human affairs ;—we must confess, that if it is a company of wrong-headed men who have diffused over the world the best lights it ever had upon the nature of God, upon the divine worship, upon morals, and upon the final destination of man.

Such are the tenets which unbelievers are forced to advance and maintain in order to elude the proofs of the christian religion. What greater credulity can there be than thus to adopt paradoxes, contrary to every thing we know of man and of his nature, and contrary to all the examples with which we are furnished from history ?

Assembly's Magazine.

PRINCE EUGENE'S PRAYER.

O God I believe in thee : do thou strengthen my belief. I hope in thee : do thou confirm my hope. I love thee : vouchsafe to redouble my love. I am sorry for my sins : O increase my repentance. I adore thee as my first principle ; I desire thee as my last end : I thank thee as my perpetual benefactor ; I call upon thee as my supreme defender. My God ! be pleased to guide me by thy wisdom, rule me by thy justice, comfort me by thy mercy, and keep me by thy power. To thee I dedicate all my thoughts, words and actions, that henceforth I may think of thee, speak of thee, act according to thy will, and suffer for thy sake.—Lord, my will is subject to thine, whatever thou willest, because it is thy will. I beseech thee to enlighten my understanding, to give bounds to my will, to purify my body, to sanctify my soul. Enable me, O my God, to reform my past offences, to conquer my future temptations, to reduce the passions that are too strong for me, and to practise the virtues that become me. O fill my heart with a tender remembrance of thy favours, an aversion for my infirmities, a love for my neighbour, and a contempt for the world. Let me also remember to be submissive to my superiors, charitable to my enemies, faithful to my friends, and indulgent to my inferiors. O God ! help me to overcome pleasure by mortification ; covetousness by alms ; anger by meekness ; and lukewarmness by devotion. O my God ! make me prudent in undertakings, courageous in danger, patient under disappointment, and humble in success. Let me never forget, O Lord, to be fervent in prayer, temperate in food, exact in my employ, and constant in my resolutions. Inspire me, O Lord, with a desire to have a quiet conscience, an outward as well as inward modesty, an edifying conversation, and a regular conduct. Let me always apply myself to resist nature, to cherish grace, to keep thy commands and to become meet for heaven. My God! do thou convince me of the meanness of the earth, the greatness of heaven, the shortness of time, and the length of eternity.— Grant that I may be prepared for death, that I may fear thy judgment, avoid hell, and obtain paradise, for the sake and merits of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE ADVANTAGES OF RELIGION.

A familiar conversation,

Between a country Minister and a day Labourer.

The Minister was walking in the country one evening, when he saw a poor man, who seemingly wished to overtake him. Of course he halted, and the countryman came up, and thus began :—

Labourer. Well, Sir, what do you think of these wars now?

Minister. Why, my friend, I think God has permitted the war to break out again, because there is so much wickedness in the land : we are such a nation of sinners !

L. But don't you think there will be peace soon ?

M. No I am afraid not ; and for the same reason.

L. well, I think you are about the mark ; for one cannot go into a public-house without seeing a great deal of wickedness going on.

M. It is surprising to see how men grow bolder and bolder in their sin. I wish all our churches and chapels were as well filled as the public-houses are. But I hope, my friend, you go to church or meeting on the Sabbath ?

L. O yes ! I am forced to go every Sunday.

M. Well, I am glad to find you do go ; but it is better to go willingly than be forced to it. God loves that we should serve him with a ready mind : however, I suppose that it is your wife compels you to go ?

L. Yes, it is ; for you see she always goes herself, and she won't let me stay away.

M. Then, I imagine, your wife loves to go.

L. Aye, I believe she does ; she would not miss upon any account when she is well. She has been in this way ever since I knew her.

M. I am pleased to hear you say so, for I know you have a good minister. Mr. — is a good preacher ; so that I hope you will go cheerfully with your wife ; for if you mind all Mr. — says to you, it would be better for you.

L. But, besides this, my wife goes among the Methodists ; she has been of that party many a year.

M. Well, never mind that ; if she gets good to her soul, don't you say a word against it. I hope you will go with her sometimes ; for though I am no Methodist myself, I think they are commendable in going about preaching among you country people.

L. I have nothing to say against them ; but I seldom go, — for every one to their own way of thinking.

M. So I say ; and I therefore beg you again to keep to your church with your good wife.

L. Aye, she is a good wife indeed ; for you see we have been married these twenty eight years, and she has been a rare wife to me ; she is so industrious and careful. Though we have eight children, there are no poor working people, as one may say, better off. My wife is so saving, that she won't let any thing be wasted. She has hardly ever spent a penny in a public house since I had her ; for I say to her when she goes to market, ' Why don't you get a sup of ale ? ' But she says, ' No, I can lay out the pence in something for the children. ' So she goes and comes without tasting a drop from year's end to year's end.

M. I am very glad, my friend, to hear such a good account of your wife. Now let me ask, Don't you think religion has made her a better wife, and a better mother than if she had no religion ?

L. Yes, I am sure of that.

M. Then, if religion has made your wife so good, would it not make you good likewise, if you were to know it, and feels its power ?

L. I suppose it would ; but you see one does not mind it as one should.

M. You speak truth, my friend ; and I will tell you how I account for it—you go to church and hear good instructions ; but you are a forgetful hearer. For instance, you hear Mr. — speaking to you about believing in Christ that you may be saved ; but you hardly ever ask yourself what it means ; for you lose all your good thoughts when you leave the church. He also exhorts you to pray ; but you neglect it. Now I am pretty certain your wife prays to God, and perhaps often.

L. Yes Sir, that she does, every night of her life.

M. I really thought so; and I wish you would do so too, remember, that a life of prayer in this world, leads to a life of praise in the next.

L. Why, as to that, you see, one comes home tired at night; and as I have to get up by four o'clock in the morning, there's but little time.

M. But if you were in good earnest about your soul, you would find time for prayer. Believe me, my friend, that praying people are the happiest people in the world:—ask your wife, and she will tell you the same thing.

L. Why, Sir, I suppose you say true, for my wife is very happy; and I am sure she makes me and the children as comfortable as she can.

M. Very well:—and now I am persuaded you think your wife is going to Heaven.

L. O yes, I believe she is; if she don't, I don't know who will.

M. Then, ought you not to be thinking how you must get to Heaven yourself? There is but one way; your wife has found it: it is a life of prayer, of faith in Christ, of loving God, and serving him sincerely, and from the heart. Now Christ says, "One thing is needful;" that is, true religion. And he also says to us, "Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life." Yet he does not mean that we should cease to labour for our daily bread, but that we should labour chiefly for the blessing of his grace, which ends in everlasting life. This is the course your wife is pursuing; and when she comes to die, everlasting life will be her portion. But will it not be a dreadful thing if your wife and you should be separated at death forever?

L. Aye, if that does take place, it will be dreadful indeed!

M. Well, I firmly believe your wife is going to Heaven; but where are you going? She chuses to go there; but you seem not to wish to go with her. If the grace of God does not prevent, and you should die in your present state, you will certainly go to hell at last. O consider how awful it will be, if, after having lived so many happy years with your wife, you must be parted forever! Think seriously of this, my friend; and I sincerely wish that you, your wife and children, may all meet in Heaven together.

Here the minister and his companion parted; the latter apparently struck with what he had heard; and the former lifting up his soul for a divine blessing to attend the interview.

R.

London Evangelical Magazine.

For the Virginia Religious Magazine.

Lines, composed on Thursday 12th of November 1807, when the atmosphere, at Lexington Va. was so loaded with vapor, as to render candles necessary at one o'clock, P. M.

How deep the gloom that veils the sight !
 Dark and terrific as the night !
 A sable mantle clothes the skies,
 And frowning columns meet the eyes !
 Now thinks the soul, that seldom thinks ;
 It's lively joy to sadness sinks—
 It thinks of God—it thinks of death !
 Deep pantings hurry every breath !
 O could it meet some cheering ray
 To chase these louring clouds away—
 Dispel its fears, nor leave behind
 Those dire forebodings of the mind !
 The clouds disperse, the light appears,
 And sweetly calms and sweetly cheers :
 It laughs at fear, and says 'tis vain ;
 Nor dreads till tempests lour again.
 Unhappy soul, by tempests tost—
 To every calm reflection lost.
 But when the light dispels thy cares,
 And nature every beauty wears,
 Fly to the Saviour, at whose voice
 In midnight shades thou may'st rejoice ;
 He'll quell the tumults of thy soul
 Should earth convulse from pole to pole.

R.

From the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

REFLECTIONS ON THE END OF THE YEAR.

1. Th' obedient sun at God's command
 Once more his course has run :
 Another year's forever fled
 And a new year begun.

2. Within the year that's now no more
What multitudes are gone,
Summon'd by death's resistless call
Into a world unknown.
3. While thousands younger far than I
Have clos'd their earthly race,
'Midst tombs unnumber'd I am spar'd,
A monument of grace.
4. And while along life's dang'rous path
Securely I have trod,
Reflect, my soul, what have I done
To serve my Guardian God?
5. How many precious hours and days
Have I in trifles spent;
What blessings unimprov'd appear,
What murm'ring discontent.
6. Blinded by earth's deluding toys
Which lead the heart astray,
How often have I turn'd aside
From wisdom's narrow way.
7. Alas, how slowly have I learn'd
Religion's heav'nly art;
How seldom have I rais'd to God
An undivided heart.
8. Ev'n in his presence, in his house,
Before his awful throne,
How often have my treach'rous thoughts
To countless follies flown.
9. How cold my zeal to praise his name
Who bled upon the tree;
How weak has been my love to him
Who groan'd and died for me.
10. Lord shouldst thou strictly mark my faults
And bring thy judgment near,
Beneath thy searching, holy eye
O how must I appear?

11. But thou art Love, thy grace can cleanse
 And sanctify my soul :
 The precious blood of Christ can make
 The wounded sinner whole.

12. Lord, glorify thy boundless grace
 By saving me from sin :
 Cast out, my God, the hateful foe,
 And make me only thine.

ASPASIO.

From the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine.

PRAYER FOR THE PRESENCE OF GOD IN HIS HOUSE.

1. How greatly blest, O Lord, are they
 Who dwell aroud thy throne above ;
 Who spend a calm, eternal day
 In rest and peace and perfect love.
2. Yet not those heavenly hosts alone
 Transported see thy smiling face ;
 On earth thou mak'st thy glory known,
 On earth thy children taste thy grace.
3. Within thy house, O Lord our God,
 Cloth'd in sweet majesty appear ;
 Make this a place of thine abode,
 And shed thy choicest blessings here.
4. When we thine awful seat surround
 Thy spirit with thy word impart ;
 And let thy gospel's joyful sound
 With pow'r divine reach every heart.
5. Here let the blind their sight obtain,
 Here give the broken spirit rest :
 Let Jesus here triumphant reign
 Enthron'd in every yielding breast.
6. Here let the voice of sacred joy
 And humble supplication rise ;
 Till higher strains our tongues employ
 In realms of bliss beyond the skies.

PHILANDER.

375
C O N T E N T S.

Biography.	PAGE.		PAGE.
Life of the Rev. Wm. Tennent	1	Reflections on Matth. xxviii. 3, 4, 5	266
Concluded	65	Selected
Martin Luther	16	Remarkable relation	74
Rev. George Whitefield	129	Letter of Dr. Johnston	220
Rev. Ezra Stiles	193	Success not the subject of reward	222
Rev. Samuel Davies	249	Concluded	268
Original Essays.		To a father of a family on the neglect of the Religious education of his children.	225
The scriptural doctrine of household baptism stated and defended.	28	Uniform piety exemplified in the conduct of Daniel.	273
Midnight thoughts	60	Influence of the Holy Spirit	277
Abridgement of lord Littleton's observations on the conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul	137	Regeneration	283
Address from the Presbytery of Hanover to the churches under its care	153	Spiritual impulses and feelings	290
Account of Mr. Jervas	92	The Saviour's appearance in the world in fancy	297
A Sabbath evening at Mr. Jervas'	161	Saving faith	299
A conversation	170	Mistakes in reading the scriptures	303
do. Concluded	199	Sentiments of Lequino	304
Dialogue on baptism	105	Extract of a letter	305
Second, do.	107	Creation	305
Power of conscience	110	Rules for controversy	303
Essay on Dress	180	Travelling by the sun and moon	310
On Horse racing	187	Petition of Sabbath day	345
Gambler's Logic tried	191	Deism	351
Preaching the gospel for money	212	Love of the world	354
Remarks on Thess. v. 6.	215	Self acquaintance	457
Acts ix. 7 reconciled with Acts xxii. 9.	219	Origin of religious errors	361
Letter from an aged minister to a young lady	247	Election considered	364
Professor and Honestus	263	On the close of the year	365
		Absurdity of infidelity	367
		Prince Eugene's prayer	368

	PAGE		PAGE
Advantages of religion	369	— from capt. Wickes to Joseph Eastburn.	243
Discourses.
On Tim. iv. 2	75	— from W. Carey to Rev. Dr. Rodgers	244
On Chron. xviii. 13	313	London Missionary So- ciety	245
Missionary Intelligence.
Letter from a clergyman in Tennessee	111	Hibernian Society	246
Letter from Nancy Fields, a Cherokee Indian	112	Extract of a letter dated New London July 1807.	246
Progress of each of the scholars at the Rev. Gideon Blackburn's se- cond Indian school	114	Bible Society	309
Remarks by the Editors	116	Obituary	247
Narrative of J. Lyle's mission—for 1805	117	Anecdote	192
—for 1806	120	Poetry.
Information respecting the missions of the United Brethren	123	The Rose	63
Letter from the mission- aries in India to the Christian Congrega- tions in the United States.	234	The happiness of early religion	64
— to Capt. B. Wickes sen.	235	An occasional hymn	128
— from the Danish Governor to C. T. Martin Esq.	237	On reading the scriptures	192
— to Mr. Joseph East- burn	328	Verses written for a pi- ous lady, &c.	247
— To R. Ralston Esq	239	Religion our only sup- port in death	248
— to same	240	Lines to the author's bro- ther on reading his po- ems	311
— to Dr. Green	241	The awakened and re- penting sinner's re- solve	311
		On time	312
		Assylum of the blind	312
		Lines composed on the dark day in November
		Reflections on the end of the year.
		Prayer for the presence of God in his house.

