GOD IN THE CITY.

Not only where thy free winds blow
Or in the silent wood,
But where the city's restless flow
Is never still, thy love we know,
And find thy presence good.

Dear God, thy sun, whose light is sweet
On hill and plain and sea,
Doth cheer the city's busy street;
And they that pass with weary feet
Give thanks for light from thee.

And thine the praise when evensong
The day of toil doth crown;
Thy shadows hush the hurried throng;
Above the houses all night long
Thy quiet stars look down.

Thy bounties from the field and mine
Come at the city's call;
The fire upon the hearth is thine,
And home, where lights of kindness shine,
The dearest gift of all.

More near than outward gifts art thou,
O Father of mankind;
Yea, these, who under burdens bow
Of toil and care, thou dost endow
With riches of thy mind.

But in the city's grief and shame
Dost thou refuse a part?
Ah, no; for burneth there the flame
Of human help in Christ's dear name:
There, most of all, thou art.

Another year! And as of old
Thy sun and rain, thy heat and cold
Will bless the open land;
And they that build and buy and sell,
And work in mill and mart, foretell,
For those, no less, who in the city dwell,
A year beneath thy hand.
